An act (H. R. No. 6141) making appropriations to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of section 254 of the Revised Statutes, and to appropriate $40,000 for the miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House this evening is assigned exclusively for reports from the Committee on the Judiciary, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] is entitled to the floor.

SUPREME COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] to yield to me to report a bill which I think will give rise to no discussion.

Mr. KNOTT. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. As the House is now quite thin, I desire to report a bill to which I think nobody will object. It is a simple bill to appoint a judge for this District.

The bill (S. No. 36) to create an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for the better administration of justice in said District, was then received.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one additional associate justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. That the said additional associate justice shall have the same power, authority, and jurisdiction as now or hereafter may be exercised by any of the associate justices of the said supreme court, and shall be entitled to receive the same salary, payable in the same manner.

SEC. 2. Two of the justices, sitting at general term, shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; but when the two justices shall be divided in opinion, the same shall be noted upon the minutes of the court, and thereupon and within four days thereafter either party in such cause may file with the clerk of the court a motion in writing to have such cause reargued before three or more justices; but no justice shall sit in general term to hear an appeal from any judgment or decree or order which he may have rendered at the special term.

SEC. 3. The general term may order two terms of the circuit court to be held at the same time, whenever in their judgment the business therein shall require it; and they shall designate by an order of the court the time and places of holding the same and the justices by whom they shall, respectively, be held; and shall make all necessary orders for a division of the docket between the justices holding such terms; and petit juries shall be drawn therefor, in the same manner as is provided for in such circuit court, at least ten days before the commencement of any such sitting.

SEC. 4. The final judgment or decree of the supreme court of the District of Columbia in any case where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the value of $2,500, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon writ of error or appeal, in the same manner and under the same regulations as are provided in cases of writs of error on judgments or appeals from decrees rendered in a circuit court.

SEC. 5. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. EDEN. I raise a point of order upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDEN. The bill makes an appropriation to pay for an additional judge, and should therefore be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Chair hear me a moment on that point of order?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The providing an additional judge by no means gives him any salary until the money for the salary is appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Creating a new office is certainly creating a new obligation and indebtedness on the part of the Government; that has always been so ruled.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I move to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering this bill.

Mr. EDEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDEN. If the House now goes into Committee of the Whole I suppose the public Calendar will be taken up, and the bills upon it considered in their order.

The SPEAKER. The session of this evening being set aside by a suspension of the rules for the purpose of considering reports from the Committee on the Judiciary, of course that order carries with it the power of the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider those reports.

Mr. EDEN. Then I hope that a quorum will be developed on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has gone to the Committee of the Whole on a point of order. That gentleman now moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAZELTON. I shall call for a division on that motion. This bill is not understood generally and we ought to have an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. BUTLER. That is why I want to go into Committee of the Whole. I want the bill thoroughly understood.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not now before the House. A point of order was raised upon the bill which the Chair sustained, and therefore the bill went to the Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Massachusetts now moves to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill.

Mr. KNOTT. It is the desire of the Committee on the Judiciary to present this evening such measures as will give rise to little discussion in order that they may take up as little time as possible and be enabled to transact as much of their business as they can. It is my impression that this bill had better be withdrawn.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well; if that is deemed best I will withdraw the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion to go into Committee of the Whole. This evening's session having been assigned for the consideration of reports from the Committee on the Judiciary, the business will be subject to similar rules as in the case of Mondays devoted to the consideration of business from the Committee for the District of Columbia. Surely the House would not put itself into the inconsistent position of saying that reports should be considered at this evening's session, and leave itself without any remedy, or any power on the part of the majority to consider such business under the rules, either in the House or in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdrew his motion.

Mr. BUTLER. No; I did not. There is a quorum here.

Mr. COX, of New York. I heard the gentleman withdraw it.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to change his mind.

Mr. BUTLER. What I proposed was to withdraw the bill. But I now insist upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 41, noes 51.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for tellers. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER and Mr. KNOTT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 70.

Mr. BUTLER. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair will entertain a motion for a call of the House or to adjourn.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I move a call of the House.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. EDEN there were—ayes 40, noes 70.

Mr. BUTLER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. EDEN and Mr. KNOTT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 33, noes 86.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to adjourn; and the next motion in order is the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINGS] that there be a call of the House.

The motion for a call of the House was agreed to, there being—ayes 67, noes 32.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I desire to state—[cries of "Regular order!"]—I desire to make excuse for a member who is sick—Mr. VAN VORHES.

The SPEAKER. That is not now in order.

The roll was called; and the following-named members failed to answer:

Bacon,	Eickhoff,	Jones, Frank	Rice, William W.
Baker, John H.	Ellis,	Jones, James T.	Riddle,

The SPEAKER. The roll-call develops the fact that there are 161 members present.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to announce that my colleague, Mr. KNAPP, is detained from the House by illness.

Mr. ROBBINS. My colleagues, Mr. YEATES and Mr. VANCE, are absent on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. A quorum being present, the Chair is ready to entertain a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I suppose that now the question upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole again comes up.

Mr. KNOTT. I hope that my colleague on the Judiciary Committee will not insist on that motion. The committee desires to get rid of as much business as possible that will not lead to discussion. It is very evident that this proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is to be discussed.

Mr. BUTLER. Will my colleague, the chairman of the committee, say that he has in charge any more important bill than this?

Mr. KNOTT. The comparative importance of bills is not now the question.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. When the question was taken on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to go into Committee of the Whole, no quorum voted. As there is now a quorum present, the Chair will again submit the motion.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 28, noes 99; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER and Mr. KNOTT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 89.

So the motion of Mr. BUTLER that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was not agreed to.

SOLDIERS' HOME, HARRODSBURGH, KENTUCKY.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 4116) authorizing the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home to sell certain property at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, belonging to the Soldiers' Home.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home be, and they are hereby, authorized to sell the property belonging to the Soldiers' Home situated at Harrodsburg, Kentucky, and known as the Harrodsburg Spring property: Provided, The same shall sell for a sum not less than $10,000.

SEC. 2. Said property shall be sold on the premises, and to the highest and best bidder, on a day to be fixed by the board of commissioners, after they shall have advertised the time, terms, and place of sale for thirty days in the Louisville Commercial, the Louisville Courier-Journal, and two other papers published in the vicinity of the property.

SEC. 3. The said board of commissioners shall sell said property for one-third cash in hand, one-third in six months, and the other third in one year; they shall take notes from the purchaser for the unpaid portion, payable to the board of commissioners, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and having the force and effect of judgments; and when all the purchase-money shall have been paid to said board of commissioners, they are directed to make to the purchaser a deed of conveyance for said property; and when said deed shall have been made and properly acknowledged, the United States shall be divested of the title to said property, and the purchaser shall be invested with the full title to the same.

Mr. KNOTT. I simply desire to say to the House, this property has not been used as a soldiers' home for a number of years. The building has been burned, and the farm is going to waste generally; and this bill is introduced in compliance with the request of the Surgeon-General of the Army of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT COURT IN DAKOTA TERRITORY.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3378) to change a term of the district court in the county of Pennington, in the Territory of Dakota.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall hereafter be a term of the district court held within and for the county of Pennington, in the Territory of Dakota, on the third Tuesday in April of each year, instead of the term authorized by law to be held on the fourth Tuesday of May in each year.

SEC. 2. All writs, processes, and legal papers whatever, made returnable to, and all recognizances, bonds, and other legal papers taken, holding persons to appear before said court at the said term holden on the fourth Tuesday in May, shall be considered returnable to the term of said court created by this act; and all indictments, informations, complaints, actions, and suits pending before said court are hereby declared to be pending before the said court at the term thereof created by this act. And said court is hereby authorized to take cognizance of all and singular the legal proceedings not disposed of, but heretofore pending in said court.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its approval.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SECTION 688 OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. SAYLER also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6168) to amend section 688 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 688 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out in the second and third lines of said section the words "in the district courts when proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;" so that said section shall read, when amended, as follows:

"SEC. 688. The Supreme Court shall have power to issue writs of prohibition and writs of mandamus in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law to any courts appointed under the authority of the United States, or to persons holding office under the authority of the United States, where a State or an embassador or other public minister or a consul or vice-consul is a party."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SECTION 5497 OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. LYNDE, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 1151) to amend section 5497 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 5497 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following, to wit: "And any officer connected with or employed in the internal-revenue service of the United States, and any assistant of such officer, who shall embezzle or wrongfully convert to his own use any money or other property of the United States, and any officer of the United States, or any assistant of such officer, who shall embezzle or wrongfully convert to his own use any money or property which may have come into his possession or under his control in the execution of such office or employment, or under color or claim of authority as such officer or assistant, whether the same shall be the money or property of the United States or of some other person or party, shall, where the offense is not otherwise punishable by some statute of the United States, be punished by a fine equal to the value of the money and property thus embezzled or converted, or by imprisonment not less than three months nor more than ten years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the title by adding the words "relating to embezzlement by officers of the United States."

The motion was agreed to; and the title of the bill was amended accordingly.

TWENTY-SECOND OF FEBRUARY A HOLIDAY.

Mr. LYNDE also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 623) to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the District of Columbia, so as to make the 22d day of February a holiday within said District.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 993 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia be, and the same hereby is, amended by adding to the days therein declared to be holidays within the District the 22d day of February; and such day shall be a holiday for all the purposes mentioned in said section: Provided, That this act shall not apply to the 22d day of February, 1878.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. The year should be 1879.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to amend by striking out "1878" and inserting "1879."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. LYNDE also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. No. 418) to amend section 532 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the division of the State of Alabama into judicial districts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 532 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 532. The State of Alabama is divided into three districts, which shall be called the southern, middle, and northern districts of Alabama. The southern district includes the counties of Mobile, Washington, Baldwin, Barbour, Butler, Choctaw, Clarke, Coffee, Conecuh, Covington, Crenshaw, Dale, Escambia, Geneva, Greene, Hale, Henry, Marengo, Monroe, Pickens, Pike, Sumter, Tuscaloosa, and Wilcox. The middle district includes the counties of Montgomery, Autauga, Chilton, Bibb, Bullock, Chambers, Clay, Coosa, Dallas, Elmore, Lee, Lowndes, Mason, Perry, Randolph, Russell, Shelby, Talladega, and Tallapoosa. The northern district includes the remaining counties of said State."

SEC. 2. That no suit or proceeding, civil or criminal, pending in the circuit or district courts of either of said districts shall be affected by the provisions of this act; and all process in cases commenced before the passage of this act, issued from either of said courts, shall be completely executed and returned according to the mandate thereof, as if this act had not passed. And said circuit and district courts shall have the same jurisdiction in reference to any crimes committed before the passage of this act as if this act had not passed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] why Tuscaloosa County is transferred by this bill from the middle to the southern district of Alabama?

Mr. LYNDE. It is a Senate bill. I have conferred with the Senators from Alabama and with several members of the House, and have understood that it is their desire the bill should pass.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do not know any reason why the county of Tuscaloosa should be transferred from the middle district to the southern. I know Montgomery is much more convenient to the people of Tuscaloosa County than Mobile, and I hope the bill will not pass unless it is amended so as to transfer Tuscaloosa back to the middle district. I move to amend the bill by striking out "Tuscaloosa" from the southern and inserting it in the middle district.

Mr. HERBERT. I was not aware, Mr. Speaker, that such a bill as this was introduced, and for one I shall oppose it. This bill proposes to redistrict the State of Alabama. By its provisions the counties of Butler, Coffee, Crenshaw, and Dale, which are now in the middle district and which are much nearer and more accessible to Montgomery than Mobile, are taken from the Montgomery district, the middle district, and put into the southern district. I can see no reason for this change and I do not know the purpose of the bill. So far as I know no member on this floor from Alabama has been consulted in relation to this change, and I therefore think it ought not to pass.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Move to lay it on the table and we will stand by you.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. No, move to recommit it.

Mr. HERBERT. I move, then, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT AND CIRCUIT COURTS OF FLORIDA.

Mr. LYNDE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill (S. No. 1277) to extend the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the southern district of Florida.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act the southern judicial district of the State of Florida shall embrace the counties of Hernando, Hillsborough, Polk, Manatee, and Monroe, in said State; and all the territory within the remaining counties shall constitute the northern judicial district.

SEC. 2. That a term of the district and circuit courts of the United States shall be held in each year at Tampa, in said district, commencing on the first Monday in March: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair or affect the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States for the northern district of Florida in any case, civil, or criminal, pending therein at the time of the passage of this act. But the same shall be proceeded in to final disposition as if this act had not been passed.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. LYNDE, from the same committee, reported back, with a substitute, the bill (H. R. No. 248) to divide the southern judicial district of Georgia into two divisions, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

Mr. BELL. I move that that bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do so for several reasons. In the first place, I knew nothing of its pendency; neither were my colleagues advised that such a bill was pending.

I do not see the necessity for the passage of this bill. In addition to this there is a county specified in the bill, when there is no county of that name in the State of Georgia—the county of Darby.

I trust the House will recommit it to the committee so that we may have an opportunity of looking into the matter.

Mr. LYNDE. The original bill was, I think, introduced by Mr. BLOUNT, and Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. SMITH both appeared before the committee and recommended its passage.

The question was taken upon recommitting the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT AND CIRCUIT COURTS OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. LYNDE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 411, a bill (H. R. No. 6169) to provide for holding the two terms of the United States district and circuit courts at Chattanooga, Tennessee.

The substitute was read a first and second time.

The bill reported as a substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be two terms of the United States district and circuit courts for the eastern district of Tennessee held at Chattanooga, in the county of Hamilton, in said district, in each year, on the first Mondays of April and October after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the clerks of the district and circuit courts for the eastern district of Tennessee, the marshal and district attorney for said district, shall perform the duties appertaining to their offices respectively for said courts. And the said clerks and marshal shall each appoint a deputy, to reside and keep their offices in the city of Chattanooga, and who shall, in the absence of their principals, do and perform all the duties appertaining to their offices respectively.

SEC. 3. That all process issued to or against parties residing in the counties of Hamilton, James, Polk, McMinn, Bradley, Meigs, Rhea, Marion, Sequatchie, Bledsoe, Grundy, Cumberland, Overton, Fentress, Scott, Morgan, and Roane shall be issued from and be returnable to said district and circuit courts at Chattanooga, and all issues of fact in such cases triable by a jury shall be tried at Chattanooga unless otherwise ordered by the court for cause shown.

SEC. 4. That each of said courts shall be held in a building to be provided for that purpose by the State or municipal authorities, and without expense to the United States.

The bill reported as a substitute was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT AND CIRCUIT COURTS OF KANSAS.

Mr. LYNDE, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 5300) to provide for the holding of terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Fort Scott, Kansas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be two terms of the United States district and circuit courts for the district of Kansas held in the city of Fort Scott in each year from and after the passage of this act, the time and length of the terms to be fixed by the judges of said courts respectively.

SEC. 2. That the clerk of the district court for the district of Kansas, the marshal, and district attorney for said district, shall perform the duties pertaining to their offices respectively for said courts; and said clerk and marshal shall appoint a deputy to reside and keep their offices at Fort Scott, and who shall, in the absence of their principals, do and perform all the duties appertaining to their said offices respectively.

SEC. 3. That each of said courts shall be held in a building to be provided for that purpose by the county or city authorities without expense to the United States.

The amendment proposed by the committee was to strike out, in the third line of the first section, the words "two terms" and insert in lieu thereof "one term."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RYAN. I have no objection to that amendment, but I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the first section. I move to amend the first section of this bill by adding to it the following:

But no cause, action, or proceeding shall be tried or considered in the courts respectively herein provided for unless by consent of all the parties thereto or order of the court for cause.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. WATERMAN.

Mr. LYNDE, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 5822) for the relief of Henry T. Fuller and others, sureties upon the official bond of William H. Waterman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Henry T. Fuller, Thomas Dickenson, Albert G. Knight, H. T. Taylor, John Elkins, and the estates of John Heath and Thomas Falvey, deceased, be, and they and each of them are hereby, released and discharged from any and all liability as the sureties upon the official bond of William H. Waterman, formerly superintendent of Indian affairs for Washington Territory, and upon the judgment rendered and docketed on the 4th day of January, A. D., 1879, in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin, in favor of the United States of America, plaintiff, and against the said Henry T. Fuller, Thomas Dickenson, Albert G. Knight, H. T. Taylor, and John Elkins, defendants, for the sum of $5,662.92 damages, and $32.05 costs, as taxed; the said release and discharge to take effect upon the payment of the legal costs as taxed in said judgment: Provided, That all the rights and remedies of the Government on said bond as against the estate and representatives of said William H. Waterman, deceased, shall in no manner be affected hereby, but remain in full force and effect in law.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I would like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. LYNDE. There is a written report accompanying the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Let it be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House bill No. 5822, and the petition of Henry T. Fuller and others, sureties, asking to be relieved from liability on the official bond of William H. Waterman, late superintendent of Indian affairs for Washington Territory, and the judgment rendered thereon, report as follows:

In the month of May, A. D. 1864, William H. Waterman, then of the city of Racine, in the State of Wisconsin, was appointed superintendent of Indian affairs for Washington Territory, and on the 27th day of May, 1864, gave his bond in the penal sum of $80,000, with Henry T. Fuller, Thomas Dickenson, Albert G. Knight, H. T. Taylor, John Elkins, Thomas Falvey, and John Heath as sureties, and thereupon the said Waterman took the oath of office and entered upon the discharge of its duties and continued to discharge the duties thereof at Olympia, Washington Territory, until the 6th day of January, A. D. 1867, on which day, he then being sick and unable to discharge the duties of said office, turned over at Olympia aforesaid, to one T. G. McKinney, the duly authorized Government agent, the said office and all the moneys, property, and effects belonging to the said office and to the Government. In October, 1866, Waterman was taken sick, and on the 18th day of January, 1867, died at Olympia, Washington Territory, some twelve days after he had turned the office over to McKinney. The sureties, all of whom resided in Racine, Wisconsin, were not informed of Waterman's death until some eight months after the occurrence, and then only by general rumor, his family consisting of a wife and several children, having in 1864 removed from the city of Racine to reside with or near by the father of Mrs. Waterman, in the State of Vermont.

It appears that after the death of Waterman one C. A. Huntington, signing himself as chief clerk, assumed to act for Waterman or his estate and made reports to the Government without the knowledge or approval of either of the sureties who signed said official bond, and without any authority whatever, he, the said Huntington, never having been appointed administrator or executor of said Waterman's estate, and such accounts so rendered by said Huntington show that in the month of December, 1866, and the first six days in January, 1867, disbursements were made to the amount of $46,965.42, and the Government accepted and acted upon the said reports made by said Huntington without requiring him to show any authority.

It appears that the sureties upon said official bond believed that the accounts of said Waterman had been settled and adjusted satisfactorily to the Government, and that they had no notice or information to the contrary until about nine years after the death of Waterman, when, on the 25th day of August, 1875, the Government commenced suit in the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Wisconsin against the surviving sureties for an alleged deficiency in Waterman's accounts of $11,656.67.

It further appears that at the time of Waterman's death, January 18, 1867, each and all the sureties to said official bond were living and solvent, and each possessed considerable property, amounting to more than $5,000 exclusive of exemptions; that at the time suit was commenced by the Government two of the sureties had died: John Heath, on the 8th day of January, 1871, whose estate was wholly consumed by losses and in the support of the surviving family. Thomas Falvey died on the 16th day of January, 1875, whose estate proved to be insolvent, and some of the other sureties had become insolvent and all very much reduced in their circumstances pecuniarily, and are compelled to rely principally upon their personal labors and efforts to support their families.

It further appears that the property which Waterman had or possessed at the time of his death has been expended in the support of his family, who are now supporting themselves by their personal labor and exertions. Immediately after the suit was commenced, the sureties, all of whom resided in Wisconsin, endeavored to ascertain the true condition of Waterman's accounts, which only could be done by procuring testimony from Washington Territory and California and by the examination of the records and papers in the Department at Washington.

It was with the greatest difficulty that the sureties procured any testimony from Washington Territory owing to the length of time which had elapsed since Waterman's death and the death of some of the witnesses and the removal of others to parts unknown, and also the inability of the sureties to find some of the books and papers necessary to show the true state of Waterman's accounts. With all these difficulties the surviving sureties succeeded in finding vouchers which satisfied the Department that the amount of the deficit claimed was erroneous, and twice it ordered the accounts opened and readjusted, and the balance claimed was reduced by the Department, on vouchers presented by the sureties and errors discovered, from $11,656.67 to $4,977.48.

At the July term, in 1878, the suit was pressed to trial, while the said sureties were still pursuing their investigations and were earnestly exerting themselves, by corresponding with parties residing in Washington Territory and California, in learning new facts showing the claim to be unfounded; and on such trial, upon evidence introduced, the court further reduced such claim in the sum of $262.96; and finally, on the 4th day of January, 1879, judgment was rendered against the surviving sureties for principal ($4,714.52) and interest, ($948.40,) amounting in all to $5,662.92.

The committee believe that the collection of this judgment, under the circumstances, from the surviving sureties would be inequitable and unjust; that the failure of the Government to notify the sureties of the deficit in Waterman's accounts until after the death of the principal and two of the co-sureties and some of the witnesses, thereby placing it out of the power of the survivors to procure the testimony necessary for the defense or to indemnify themselves from the estate of the principal, is a sufficient reason for the discharge of the judgment; and they therefore report in favor of the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GERMAIN H. MASON.

Mr. CONGER, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4123) for the relief of Germain H. Mason, of Michigan.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Germain H. Mason, of Michigan, the sum of $192.65, the balance due him for services as United States circuit court commissioner, performed in and during the seven years prior to 1871, as shown by the records of the Treasury Department.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TESTIMONY IN PRIVATE CLAIMS BEFORE CONGRESS.

Mr. FRYE, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, Senate bill No. 43, to provide for taking testimony to be used before Congress in cases of private claims against the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any committee of either House of Congress, before which any private claim against the United States may at any time be pending, being first thereto authorized by the House appointing them, may order testimony to be taken, and books and papers to be examined, and copies thereof proved, before any standing master in chancery of the circuit of the United States within the judicial district where such testimony or evidence is to be taken. Such master in chancery, upon receiving a copy of the order of such committee, signed by its chairman, setting forth the time and place when and where such examination is to be had, the questions to be investigated, and, so far as may be known to the committee, the names of the witnesses to be examined on the part of the United States, and the general nature of the books, papers, and documents to be proved, if known, shall proceed to give to such private parties reasonable notice of the time and place of such examination, unless such notice shall have been or shall be given by such committee or its chairman, or by the attorney or agent of the United States, or waived by such private party. And such master shall issue subpœnas for such witnesses as may have been named in the order of such committee and such others as the agent or other representative of the United States hereinafter mentioned shall request. And he shall also issue subpœnas at the request of such private party or parties for such witnesses within such judicial district as they may desire: Provided, That the United States shall not be liable for the fees of any officer for serving any subpœna for any private party, nor for the fees of any witness on behalf of such party. Said committee may inform the district attorney of the United States for the district where the testimony is to be taken of the time, place, and object of such examination, and request his attendance in behalf of the Government in conducting such examination, in which case it shall be his duty to attend in person, or by an assistant employed by him, to conduct such examination on the part of the United States, or such committee may, at its option, appoint an agent or attorney or one of its own members for that purpose, as they may deem best; and in that event, if the committee shall not be unanimous, the minority of the committee may also appoint such agent or attorney or member of such committee to attend and take part in such examination.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the marshal of the United States for the district in which the testimony is to be taken to serve, or cause to be served, all subpœnas issued in behalf of the United States under this act, in the same manner as if issued by the circuit court for his district; and he shall, upon being first paid his fees therefor, serve any subpœnas that may be issued at the instance of such private party or parties. And the said master may, in his discretion, appoint any other person to serve any subpœna. Such master shall have full power to administer oaths to witnesses, and the same power to issue attachments to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, as the circuit or district court of his district would have in a case pending before it; and it shall be his duty to report the conduct of contumacious witnesses before him to the House of Congress appointing such committee. The compensation of such master in chancery, and of marshals and deputy marshals, and of any person appointed to serve papers, shall be the same as for like services in equity cases in the circuit court of the United States; and the compensation of witnesses shall be the same as for like attendance and travel of witnesses before such circuit courts; and all such fees and compensation of officers and witnesses on behalf of the United States, and other expenses of all investigations which may be had under the provisions of this act on the part of the United States, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the branch of Congress appointing such committee. Said master, when the examination is concluded, shall attach together all the depositions and exhibits, and attach thereto his certificate setting forth or referring to the authority by which they were taken, any notices he may have given, the names of the witnesses for whom subpœnas or attachments were issued, the names of witnesses who attended, with the time of attendance and mileage and fees of each witness on behalf of the United States, which he may require to be shown by affidavit, his own fees, the fees of the marshal, his deputies or other persons serving papers, giving the items, and such other facts in relation to the circumstances connected with the taking of the depositions as he may deem material. He shall then seal up such depositions and papers securely, direct them to the chairman of such committee at Washington, stating briefly on the outside the nature of the contents, and place the same in the post-office, paying the postage thereon; and said package shall be opened only in the presence of such committee. The chairman of any committee ordering testimony to be taken under this act shall, at least ten days before the time fixed for such examination and within two days after the adoption of such order, cause a copy thereof to be directed and delivered to the Attorney-General of the United States, or sent to him by mail at the Department of Justice, to enable him to give such instructions as he may deem best to the district attorney of the district where such testimony is to be taken, who may, and, if required by the Attorney-General, shall, though not requested by the committee, appear for the United States in person or by assistant and take such part in such examination as the Attorney-General shall direct.

Mr. EDEN. I should doubt very much, just from hearing that bill read, the policy of enacting it into a law. It occurs to me that it will increase enormously the amount of claims that will be brought before Congress for adjudication, and that it must necessarily increase the number of deputy marshals and assistant district attorneys, if the Government of the United States is to be represented in the taking of this testimony in such a manner as to be at all safe for the Government.

It occurs to me that if we intend to have judicial or quasi-judicial investigation of claims that are to come before Congress we had better establish a tribunal for the purpose of ascertaining the facts in reference to those claims.

Some of the committees of this House have thousands of claims pending before them. I presume that the Committee on War Claims have two or three thousand claims of one sort and another pending before them. The Committee of Claims probably have as many more, as have the Committee on Indian Affairs and various other committees of this House.

Mr. FRYE. I have not yielded the floor at all to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.] I would like to know how long a time he wishes to occupy.

Mr. EDEN. This is a very important bill, and there ought to be considerable time occupied by some one upon it.

Mr. FRYE. I have not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SPRINGER.) The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDEN. I raise a point of order on the bill.

Mr. FRYE. It is too late to make a point of order after discussion has proceeded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is too late.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. FRYE. I have not yielded the floor for that purpose.

Mr. BUCKNER. Well, when we get the chance, we will do it.

Mr. FRYE. I do not desire to cut off the gentleman for any reasonable length of time he desires to occupy, if he will only indicate what time he wants.

Mr. EDEN. I had occupied only about a minute. I think I was cut off rather abruptly.

Mr. FRYE. How long a time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. EDEN. I am not disposed to insist upon any time at all.

Mr. FRYE. I was simply looking for my rights and the rights of the rest of the Committee on the Judiciary, who have some reports to make here to-night. I did not intend any insult to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN,] not the least.

Mr. EDEN. Certainly not.

Mr. FRYE. Having had a little experience, both on the Committee of Claims of the Forty-second Congress, and also on the Committee of the Judiciary, I have for a long time been satisfied that some provision of law was absolutely necessary for the safety of the United States, by which in certain cases, now and then a case, perhaps not more than half a dozen in an entire Congress, the committees could provide for taking testimony at a distance from the Capitol, for examining books, and compelling papers to be produced without going through all the paraphernalia of coming into the House, and having the authority conferred by an order of the House.

When this bill came from the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate with its unanimous indorsement, and was passed by the Senate and sent to the House and referred to our committee, it was handed to me to examine. I became satisfied that the bill met an existing necessity. I cannot conceive how on earth it can increase the number of claims presented; I cannot see how it can increase the number of district attorneys or assistant district attorneys or otherwise add to the expenses of the Government. I can see how it may save the Government thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars by securing a careful examination of witnesses by affidavit or deposition before a master in chancery.

I have no pride of opinion about this measure; I care nothing about it personally; but in order to save time, I demand the previous question.

Mr. HANNA. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether the taking of testimony under this bill is not limited to cases in which a committee may order such examination?

Mr. FRYE. It is strictly limited to cases where a committee may order an examination.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. EDEN. As there has been no discussion on this bill, and as it is a very important one, I move that it be laid on the table.

The motion of Mr. EDEN was not agreed to; there being—ayes 7, noes 115.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOCIETY OF JESUIT FATHERS OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 878) to disapprove and annul an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, passed on the 18th of January, 1878, by a two-third vote of both houses, over the veto of the governor of said Territory.

The bill was read. It provides that an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico entitled "An act to incorporate the Society of the Jesuit Fathers of New Mexico," which passed both houses of said Legislative Assembly on or about the 18th day of January, 1878, over the veto of the governor of said Territory, being in violation of section 1889 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which declares, "The Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories shall not grant private charters or especial privileges," said bill being a grant of a private charter or act of incorporation, with the "especial privileges" of an unlimited power to acquire, hold, and transfer all kinds of property, both real and personal, and the exemption from taxation of all the effects and property of said corporation, be disapproved and declared null and void.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. FRYE] a question. Is it a rule generally enforced in the Territories that the territorial Legislatures shall not grant corporate privileges?

Mr. FRYE. It is the rule that they shall not grant privileges of such a character as those sought to be conferred by the territorial act which this bill proposes to annul.

Mr. KNOTT. If my colleague on the committee [Mr. FRYE] will yield to me a moment I think I can explain this matter to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] The organic act of the Territory of New Mexico expressly prohibits the territorial Legislature from passing any such act as that which this bill proposes to annul. There is a special prohibition against the granting to private corporations of any special privileges or franchises whatever.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to the bill; but from hearing it read, it occurred to me that it might go further than was intended. It seemed to me to deny to the territorial Legislatures the power of granting ordinary corporate privileges which I supposed was done every day.

Mr. FRYE. The territorial Legislature of New Mexico granted an act of incorporation to the Jesuit fathers, and by that act authorized them to take and hold property to an unlimited amount, and also exempted the whole of such property from taxation. Such legislation was clearly beyond the power of the territorial Legislature under the Revised Statutes. The governor vetoed the bill; but it was repassed over his veto by a heavy vote; and the only way to prevent its becoming a law is for the Congress of the United States to disapprove and annul it. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FRYE. I have here another bill which I was very desirous to report; but, in accordance with the understanding which I believe exists among members of the committee that only matters of a certain class shall be reported on the first call to-night, I yield the floor to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to present a bill. If it provokes any discussion I will not press it.

Mr. KNOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

ANN GREGORY.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the bill which I now report be read; and before any point of order is raised upon it (I admit that it is liable to a point of order) I desire to make a very brief explanation.

The bill (H. R. No. 1545) for the relief of Ann Gregory, widow of Charles N. Gregory, deceased, was read, as follows:

Whereas, by a decree of condemnation of the United States district court for the eastern district of Virginia, one certain tenement and lot of land situate, lying, and being in the city of Alexandria, State of Virginia, being the property of William N. McVeigh, was condemned as forfeited to the United States, under the general confiscation act of July 17, 1862; that thereupon the said lot of land was sold, and conveyance thereof made by John Underwood, as United States marshal for the eastern district of Virginia, to Charles N. Gregory, deceased, and that the said tenement and lot of land was conveyed by the said United States marshal, by deed bearing date the 11th day of April, 1864, to the said Charles N. Gregory, deceased, for the consideration of $1,500, which was paid into the Treasury of the United States; and

Whereas, also, by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered at its October term, A. D. 1876, the sale of the said premises so made to the said Charles N. Gregory was declared void, and the said William N. McVeigh declared entitled to recover possession of the said premises, notwithstanding the sale thereof by the United States under the said decree of forfeiture and confiscation; and

Whereas the said William N. McVeigh, under the judgment of the said Supreme Court, has recovered possession of the said premises so as aforesaid sold by the United States to the said Charles N. Gregory, deceased: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed and required to pay to Ann Gregory, widow of Charles N. Gregory, deceased, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the said sum of $1,500, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date of the sale of the said premises by the United States to the said Charles N. Gregory, deceased.

Mr. BUTLER. I think everybody will agree that this bill ought to pass. It merely proposes to pay back money that was paid for a bad title. There are twenty precedents for it.

Mr. BUCKNER. How about the allowance of interest?

Mr. BUTLER. Interest ought to be paid, because the husband of Mrs. Gregory had to pay for the use and occupation of the property in the shape of mesne profits, besides losing the purchase-money that had been paid. The report of the committee cites four cases in which interest has been allowed under similar circumstances. The money was paid for a void title.

Mr. BUCKNER. I understand that, and I see the propriety of refunding the money; but I do not see on what principle the Government should depart from the well-established rule not to pay interest in matters of this kind.

Mr. BUTLER. The Government never pays interest on any contract; but when it restores money which has been improperly received it does pay interest. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

Mr. BUTLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RESTORATION OF COURT RECORDS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the bill (H. R. No. 5315) to restore the records and files in the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas lately destroyed by fire, with amendments by the Senate, and to ask the House to concur in those amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 902 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

In any proceedings in conformity with law to restore the records of any court of the United States which have been or may be hereafter lost or destroyed, the notice required may be served on any non-resident of the district in which such court is held anywhere within the jurisdiction of the United States or in any foreign country; the proof of service of such notice, if made in a foreign country, to be certified by a minister or consul of the United States in such country, under his official seal.

SEC. 2. That section 903 of said Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

A certified copy of the official returns, or any other official paper of the United States attorney, marshal, or clerk, or other certifying or recording officer of any court of the United States, made in pursuance of law, and on file in any department of the Government, relating to any cause or matter in which the United States was a party in any such court, the record of which has been or may be lost or destroyed, may be filed in the court to which it appertains, and shall have the same force and effect as if it were an original paper or other document made to or filed in such court; and in any case in which the names of the parties and the date and amount of judgment or decree shall appear from such returns, paper, or document, it shall be lawful for the court in which they are filed to issue the proper process to enforce such decree or judgment, in the same manner as if the original record remained in said court. And in all cases where any of the files, papers, or records of any court of the United States have been or shall be lost or destroyed, the files, records, and papers which, pursuant to law, may have been or may be restored or supplied in place of such records, files, and papers, shall have the same force and effect, to all intents and purposes, as the originals thereof would have been entitled to.

SEC. 3. That section 904 of said Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

That whenever any of the records or files in which the United States are interested of any court of the United States have been or may be lost or destroyed, it shall be the duty of the attorney of the United States for the district or court to which such files and records belong, so far as the judges of such courts respectively shall deem it essential to the interests of the United States for such records and files to be restored or supplied, to take such steps, under the direction of said judges, as may be necessary to effect such restoration or substitution, including such dockets, indices, and other books and papers as said judges shall think proper. Said judges may direct the performance, by the clerks of said courts respectively and by the United States attorneys, of any duties incident thereto; and said clerks and attorneys shall be allowed such compensation for services in the matter and for lawful disbursements as may be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, upon a certificate by the judges of said courts stating that such claim for services and disbursements is just and reasonable; and the sum so allowed shall be paid out of the judiciary fund.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the records and files of district and circuit courts of the United States lost or destroyed."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREDERICK CARLISLE.

Mr. CULBERSON also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 4054) for the relief of Frederick Carlisle, of Pontiac County, Michigan.

The bill was read.

Mr. EDEN. I reserve all points of order until some explanation is made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. If a point of order is made the bill will have to go to the Private Calender.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SPRINGER.) The point of order has not been made. The gentleman from Illinois has intimated that he reserves the right to make the point of order until an explanation is made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendment, ordered to be printed.

JESSE TURNER AND OTHERS.

Mr. CULBERSON also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 1038) for the relief of Jesse Turner and others, sureties upon the official bond of George W. Clarke, formerly Indian agent.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Jesse Turner, James M. Brown, Charles F. Brown, and the estates of S. M. Hays, Hiram Brodie, S. F. Cottrell, P. H. White, and Joseph J. Green, deceased, be, and they and each of them are hereby, released from any and all liability as the sureties upon the official bond of George W. Clarke, formerly Indian agent; the said release to take effect upon the payment of the legal costs heretofore accrued in the prosecution of said claim by the United States: Provided, That all the rights and remedies of the Government on said bond as against said George W. Clarke shall in no manner be affected hereby, but remain in full force and effect in law.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I make the point of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the bill is not subject to the point of order, as it does not make any appropriation or require any appropriation of money out of the Treasury.

Mr. EDEN. Then I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER. The bill is for the release of sureties, and that surely takes money out of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A suit on the sureties' bond might bring money into the Treasury; but the money is not now in the Treasury, and the bill does not propose to take any money now in the Treasury out of it.

Mr. EDEN. I do not think the bill should pass without some examination.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Is not this a unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. CULBERSON. It passed the Judiciary Committee unanimously.

Mr. FRANKLIN. And it was thoroughly discussed in the Senate. I think it ought to pass.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think if the gentleman from Illinois will hear the report read he will have no objection to the passage of the bill.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration the Senate bill No. 1038, for the relief of Jesse Turner and others, sureties upon the official bond of George W. Clarke, formerly Indian agent, and beg leave to make the following report:

George W. Clarke was appointed Indian agent and gave bonds as such August 19, 1854, in a penalty of $40,000, with S. M. Hays, Phineas H. White, Charles F. Brown, S. F. Cotterell, Hiram Brodie, James M. Brown, Joseph J. Green, and Jesse Turner as sureties; all of the sureties are dead except James M. Brown, Charles F. Brown, and Jesse Turner.

The agent, Clarke, was found to be in default and relieved from duty on December 31, 1856. The amount of the defalcation is found to be $1,245.77.

No further action was taken in this case until December 15, 1875, when each of the parties living was notified.

Suit was instituted March 6, 1877, in the United States district court for the western district of Arkansas.

The above are the facts as gathered from a letter of Hon. K. Rayner, Solicitor of the Treasury, bearing date February 7, 1878, in response to a letter from a member of this committee, to whom the subject had been referred. The following is an affidavit in the case, which is substantiated by several others:

STATE OF ARKANSAS, Crawford County, ss:

I, Augustus I. Ward, of Crawford County, State of Arkansas, do state upon oath that I have resided at Van Buren, Crawford County, for the last thirty-four years; that I was well acquainted with George W. Clarke and Samuel M. Hayes, P. H. White, S. F. Cotterell, Hiram Brodie, J. J. Green, Charles F. Brown, James M. Brown, and Jesse Turner, his securities upon his bond as Indian agent, upon which his now reported defalcation occurred in December, 1856. I know that George W. Clarke was the owner of real estate at that time of considerable amount, but do not know what incumbrances, if any, existed against it. His family resided here during most of the time he was in Kansas as Indian agent. Clarke was an energetic man to raise money. All the persons who are named as the securities upon his bond were in solvent circumstances in December, 1856. Since that time up to the time of the breaking out of the late war the sum of $1,500 could have been made out of any one of them. Since then the results of the late war and other causes changed the circumstances of all the persons named as Clarke's securities, and most of them are unable to pay who survived the war.

P. H. White died about 1857. He was a merchant, engaged in business at this place. His estate was closed by administration since the war, and did not pay the creditors in full.

Joseph J. Green died in the spring of 1863. His estate was administered upon. After paying his debts but little was left, which was used or expended for the support of his children. The administration has been closed long since.

Samuel M. Hays, one of the securities upon Clarke's bond, died in 1871. His estate has been administered upon; not yet closed. He left some property, both real and personal, but, after the payment of the debts probated against the estate, I think there will be but little left.

Hiram Brodie, one of the securities on Clarke's bond, died in February, 1875. The estate is being administered upon, and I am informed and believe that after the payment of the debts probated against said estate there will be but little left; the property of the estate was small in amount.

Sutton F. Cotterell, another of the reported securities, died about November, 1875, at Little Rock, Arkansas. His estate was insolvent. Had no property, as I am informed

Charles F. Brown, another of the named securities upon Clarke's bond, is insolvent; has no property; took the benefit of the bankrupt law since the war, and has been discharged; paid his debts in that way.

James M. Brown left this county in 1862; had property in negroes and mules at the time he left here, and some real estate, long since sold. His present circumstances I have no means of knowing, as he resides in the State of Texas.

Jesse Turner I have known intimately for thirty-four years. He is a practicing attorney at this place, advanced in life, has some real estate; and should he have this debt to pay, it will greatly embarrass him, and he can only pay it at a great sacrifice of his small amount of property.

I have been engaged in the business of a merchant, most of the time at my residence, at Van Buren, Crawford County, for the past thirty-four years, and have, as I believe, the means of knowledge of the matters hereinbefore stated by me.

AUGUSTUS J. WARD.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 15th day of February, A. D. 1878.

JOHN B. OGDEN,
Notary Public.

From the letter of the Solicitor of the Treasury and this affidavit we obtain the following facts:

George W. Clarke, the Indian agent, became defaulter, and his defalcation was known the Government December 31, 1856. No further action was taken in the matter until December 15, 1875, a space of nineteen years lacking fifteen days, the sureties being uninformed of the defalcation for that space of time. Suit was brought March 6, 1877, which is more than twenty years after the right of action had accrued. If the Government had used proper diligence, it is quite probable all or a good portion of the amount could have been made out of the principal; certainly the other securities could have all been compelled to pay their pro rata of the amount, and these securities relieved to that extent. The Government, by its own laches, has lost a part of its security, and to that extent has damaged the other remaining securities.

In a case in England it was declared by one of the judges "that long dormant claims have more of cruelty than justice in them, and that Christianity forbids an attempt at enforcing the payment of a debt which time and misfortune have rendered the debtor unable to discharge." (See A'Lourt vs. Cross, 3 Bing. R. 329.)

Of the original eight sureties five are dead and three living, and possessed of very limited means, perhaps none worth anything, unless it be Jesse Turner, who is a practicing attorney, advanced in years, and owning a small amount of real estate.

Under the circumstances the committee believe that great injustice has been done to the sureties by the delay on the part of the Government, and think that the remaining sureties should be relieved from liability on said bond, and therefore report the bill to the House and recommend its passage.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. That is all right.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDEN. As the Judiciary Committee seems to have nothing to report but private claims, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire further to report from the Judiciary Committee a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 2493) for the better organization of the district courts of the United States within the State of Louisiana.

Mr. EDEN. Is not a motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is now in order.

Mr. SPARKS. Then I make the motion that the House do now adjourn.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the appointment of an additional judge for the District of Columbia was sent to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. EDEN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. SPARKS. I have moved that the House adjourn. I do not yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] moves to adjourn. Pending that, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the appointment of an additional judge for the District of Columbia was referred to the Committee of the Whole House. That motion cannot be considered at this time; but it is a privileged question to move to reconsider any action of the House within the time prescribed in the rules, and the making of that motion takes precedence of a motion to adjourn. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be entered, and its consideration may be called up hereafter.

Mr. EDEN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order to make that motion, as the motion to adjourn takes precedence of the consideration of the motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 75, noes 47.

Mr. ACKLEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 18, noes 86; the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote.

Mr. ACKLEN. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ACKLEN and Mr. SPARKS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 30, noes 85. So, the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the roll is called I desire to make this proposition to the House: it is known that six members of the Judiciary Committee, in compliance with the order of the House, have to leave the city to-morrow or next day. I have several bills in which gentlemen are particularly interested, and which they press me to report. The one I have sent to the desk was introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ELAM.] He is especially anxious that it should be reported; and if the House will allow me to report it and have the previous question ordered on it, so that it may go over as unfinished business, I will then yield for a motion to adjourn, as it seems that the House does not desire to entertain other business to-night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the previous question may be ordered on the bill he has indicated, that it may be pending as unfinished business to-morrow morning.

Mr. ACKLEN. I give notice that I will offer an amendment at the proper time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would be in the nature of an objection.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to ask the gentleman if this is the unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is.

Mr. BURCHARD. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being put, there were—ayes 85, noes 10.

So the order for the yeas and nays was reconsidered.

The question then recurred upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope the motion to adjourn will be withdrawn and opportunity given to the gentleman from Texas to report his bill.

Mr. SPARKS. I withdraw the motion.

DISTRICT COURTS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 6170 as a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 2493) for the better organization of the district courts of the United States within the State of Louisiana, and moved the previous question thereon.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

And then, on motion of Mr. SPARKS, (at ten o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 25, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 1660) for the relief of Edward Rice; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business on which the main question was ordered is the bill (H. R. No. 6170) for the better organization of the district court of the United States within the State of Louisiana, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 2493.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill for the better organization of the district court of the United States within the State of Louisiana.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the more convenient transaction of business in the courts of the United States within the State of Louisiana, the said State shall be, and the same is hereby, divided into two judicial districts in the manner following, to wit: The parishes of Sabine, De Soto, Caddo, Natchitoches, Bossier, Rapides, Claiborne, Jackson, Catahoula, Caldwell, Ouachita, Union, Morehouse, Franklin, East and West Carroll, Madison, Tensas, Concordia, Avoyelles, Calcasieu, Vernon, Grant, Winn, Bienville, Red River, Richland, Webster, and Cameron shall compose one district, to be called the western district of Louisiana, and all the remaining part of the said State shall compose another district, to be called the eastern district of Louisiana; and all criminal prosecutions or civil suits, either in law or equity, which have arisen in the western district, or against persons residing therein, or concerning lands situated therein, together with all process, writs, recognizances, and records belonging thereto, shall be transferred to the western district; and all civil suits hereafter instituted against persons residing in said western district, or suits concerning lands situate in the same, in the courts of the United States, shall be in said district; and there shall be held semi-annually in said district two stated sessions of the court, at each of the following places, to wit: At Alexandria, on the first Monday of January and June, for the parishes of Calcasieu, Rapides, Avoyelles, Grant, Vernon, and Cameron; at Natchitoches, on the third Monday of January and June, for the parishes of Natchitoches, Winn, Sabine, and Red River; at Shreveport, on the second Mondays of February and July, for the parishes of Caddo, De Soto, Bossier, Claiborne, Bienville, and Webster; at Monroe, on the first Mondays of March and August, for the parishes of Ouachita, Jackson, Union, Morehouse, Franklin, Catahoula, East and West Carroll, Madison, Tensas, Concordia, Lincoln, and Richland; and a person learned in the law, residing in said western district, shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, judge thereof, with a salary of $4,000 per annum, payable quarterly on his own warrant, with the same powers and duties as the district judge of the United States for the district of Louisiana as it now exists, and such as are conferred on him or required of him by this act, who is required to hold said terms, and authorized and required to hold special sessions of the said court in the said western district for the trial of civil or criminal cases whenever he may deem it expedient; that all process, writs, and recognizances of every kind, whether respecting juries, witnesses, bail, or otherwise, which relate to causes to be tried at said special sessions, shall be considered as belonging to such sessions in the same manner as if they had been issued or taken in reference thereto; that any special session may be adjourned to any time or times previous to the next stated meeting of the district court for said districts; that all business pending for trial at any special court shall, at the close thereof, be considered as of course removed to the next stated term of the court; that the district court in said western district shall perform all the duties and possess all the powers of circuit courts of the United States for the State of Louisiana, except in cases of appeal and writs of error. And the said judge shall appoint a clerk of the court in the western district for each place where the court sits, who shall reside and keep the records of the court at that place, and shall receive for the services performed by them the same fees and compensation that are allowed to the clerk of said court holding its sessions in New Orleans, in the same State, and shall be subject in every respect to the same restrictions and responsibilities; and the district court for the eastern district shall be held in New Orleans, as heretofore. And it shall be the duty of the clerks of the district and circuit courts of the United States in New Orleans to transmit, by some safe conveyance, or deliver to the clerks of the western district, or their order, the original papers in all such cases as properly belong to the court in the western district by the provisions of this act, together with a transcript of the proceedings had therein.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint one person as marshal and one as district attorney for the said western judicial district of the United States within the State of Louisiana created by this act; and that the terms of appointment and service, together with the duties and responsibilities of the said marshal and district attorney, respectively, for the district aforesaid, be in all respects the same within their said district, as to the terms of appointment and services, the duties, and responsibilities of the marshal and district attorney, respectively, of the eastern district of the State of Louisiana; and said marshal shall receive such fees and emoluments as are received by the marshal of the United States for the State of Louisiana, and said attorney an annual compensation of —— hundred dollars, to be paid quarterly on his own warrant, and the same fees and emoluments as are allowed to the attorney of the United States for the district of Louisiana.

Mr. ACKLEN. I ask consent to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, which I understand is agreed to.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out the names of the parishes Calcasieu and Cameron wherever they appear in the bill as belonging to the eastern district of Louisiana.

Mr. CULBERSON. We are willing to consent to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the amendment was entertained and agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the special assignment for this morning.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. MILLS. I understand that that has not been made the special order. The gentleman having charge of the bill only gave notice that he would move to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering it.

The SPEAKER. Rule 119 will be read.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

General appropriation bills shall be in order in preference to any other bills of a public nature unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the House.

And the House may, at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, make any of the general appropriation bills a special order.

Mr. MILLS. Then I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can reach the object he has in view by voting down the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BANKS. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. And pending that motion I move that all general debate be limited to one hour and a half.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the House will vote down that motion and let us have a morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen who desire to make that issue need not make it upon the first motion, which is simply to close debate.

Mr. HALE. What antagonizes this motion?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour.

The question was taken upon the motion to close debate, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the motion just adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole; and being put, there were on a division—ayes 99, noes 63.

So the motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6143) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House general debate is limited to one hour and a half. If there be no objection the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. BLOUNT. The amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill is $34,960,343; the estimates of the Department were $36,571,900. The amount appropriated by the bill below the estimates is $1,611,557. As compared with the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, this bill exceeds that of 1879 by $1,253,970.

It will be observed that for the first time since this House has come under the control of the democratic party there is an increase in the appropriations proposed for the postal service. I propose for a short time to occupy the attention of this committee by a comparative statement of the expenditures and growth of the postal service for a period of years, in order to show that much has been done in the way of reducing the expenditures of this branch of the service, while its growth has been unparalleled.

In 1871 the expenditures for the Post-Office Department were $24,390,104.08. In 1872 there was an increase of nearly three millions, or $26,658,192.31. In 1873 the expenditures were $29,084,945.67—again an increase of nearly three millions. In 1874 the expenditures were $32,126,414.76: in 1875, $34,078,610.87, and in 1876, $33,960,004.36. The reduction in the last year arose from a reduction of what is known as the star service. The first post-office appropriation bill passed by a democratic House, in the Forty-fourth Congress, was for $32,612,941.14, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877. In 1878 the expenditures for the Post-Office Department were $33,874,647, and for the year ending June 30, 1879, with the deficiency which we have already appropriated, the amount is $33,706,373. Therefore, notwithstanding the immense increase in the railway service, the star service, and the postal-car service, there has been a reduction of the expenditures in the Post-Office Department. And but for the legislation which has been had the amount appropriated by this bill would be between three and three and a half millions more than is here proposed.

Under the act of 1876 there was a reduction of the compensation to railroads of nearly nine millions of dollars, and under the act of 1878 of nearly five millions. Under the act of 1876 there was a reduction in the compensation of postmasters of $370,000, and under the the act of 1878 of about $1,250,000

The Committee on Appropriations found that during the last fiscal year there was a very great increase in the postal-car service. In the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General the increase for 1878 over 1877 is stated at 5.66 per cent. for transportation of mails by railroads. Being so far beyond the calculations of the Committee on Appropriations they undertook to analyze the cause of this large increase—an increase far beyond that of the preceding year.

During the discussion on the post-office deficiency appropriation bill the House sought to obtain from the Department some information as to the growth of the postal-car service; they were unable to do it. There was some vague information given to the House, but it was almost entirely conjectural. Since that time the Committee on Appropriations, after a labor of three weeks in the Department, have been enabled to obtain some accurate information.

They find that for the fiscal year of 1876–'77 the expenditure for the postal-car service was as follows: For the first quarter, $175,379.92; for the second quarter, $155,412.85; for the third quarter, $186,359.87; and for the fourth quarter, $193,235.05. For the next fiscal year, when there was this large increase, the cost was as follows: For the first quarter, $203,364.54; for the second quarter, $206,994.37; for the third quarter, $255,822.04; and for the fourth quarter, $261,591.38. That shows an increase for the postal-car service of $217,384.64. This shows that the Department has forced forward the postal-car service far beyond what it has the railway mail service, and thereby created a deficiency of about $44,000 during the last fiscal year.

In view of these facts the Committee on Appropriations thought it wise that the postal-car service should be separate from the other railway service where we pay by weight; they thought so for several reasons. In the first place, when we came to seek information, there was not an officer in the Post-Office Department, from the Postmaster-General down, who could give to the House of Representatives any statement whatever as to the growth of the postal-car service. There is nothing in the reports of the Postmaster-General, from the beginning of the service down to this day, indicating the growth of that service. We are blindly, from year to year, voting an increase of appropriations for that service, without knowing what we are doing. The whole question is simply in the hands of a subordinate officer in the Post-Office Department, the superintendent of the railway service, who is permitted to say what the amount of this service shall be throughout the country and where it shall be.

The committee hoped that by separating this service hereafter we would have a statement of the accounts, a statement of the roads upon which the service was placed, together with estimates for the service, and that thus we would be in a position to determine how far the increase of expenditures was right and restrain it or regulate it as we saw fit.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, there had been, as appears, an appropriation amply sufficient for the railway transportation of this country, and more than ample; yet a deficiency appears for the railway service of $44,000 for the year 1878. By simply proceeding more slowly in the increase of this postal-car service this deficiency would have been avoided, and the Postmaster-General would not have made himself liable to any complaint for violating the laws in relation to deficiencies.

It is the right of this House to say how much money shall be appropriated for any given service for any given year; and it is its bounden duty to do so. With the view, therefore, of giving the history of the service from year to year, of anticipating its growth and providing for it in detail, we have thought best to separate it from other railroad service. The committee therefore propose an appropriation of $1,250,000 for transportation by postal-cars as apart from the appropriation for railway mail service.

In the course of the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule I shall offer two amendments. The first authorizes the Postmaster-General to transfer any portion of the appropriation not needed for postal-car service to the payment of railroads for transportation by weight. This is founded on an intimation that perhaps the whole sum proposed to be appropriated may not be needed.

I shall likewise offer an amendment providing that the expenditure of any given quarter of the fiscal year shall not, if taken at that rate per annum, exceed the amount appropriated. The reason for this amendment will appear from an examination of the history of the increase during the last fiscal year. The increase may be small the first quarter, and small the second quarter, while on the fourth quarter it may be twofold what it was on the preceding quarters. Thus the postal service, instead of being increased by the use of that amount 3 per cent., might be increased 10 per cent. or 16 per cent. according as the increase occurred in the first or the fourth quarter.

In the matter of railroad transportation the committee have seen fit to recommend to this House an appropriation of $8,715,310. This sum has been reached by an examination of the rate of increase in the postal-car service during the last fiscal year, the increase for railroads being about 2.66 per cent. Our appropriation of $8,715,310 will allow an increase of 3½ per cent. Assuming that the annual increase on new railways would be about one thousand miles more than heretofore, we have added about $50,000 to that, making about 4 per cent., and then deducted the sum of $97,000 (which the Department failed to notice either in the annual report or in any communications to the subcommittee) as the sum which will be deducted at the beginning of the next fiscal year on account of the contracts which are to expire, and which because of there being existing contracts with the Government at the time of the passage of the act of 1876, reducing compensation to railroads, have never been subjected to that reduction. Hence there is a difference to the extent of $97,000 in the amount needed for that service. In this way by a liberal allowance, as we conceive, for increased mileage we have reached the sum proposed in the bill.

In the matter of steamboat service——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Before the gentleman leaves the subject of railway mail service, I wish to make a suggestion.

I do not know that it is objectionable—on the contrary I think it is probably praiseworthy—to separate the appropriation for postal mail cars from the appropriation for railway mail transportation, provided a sufficient sum be appropriated for the postal-car service. If you give the Postmaster-General a liberal allowance for this service he may upon one of the great trunk lines mass mail trains as was done with regard to the fast mail service upon the New York Central road a few years ago. This would increase the pay for the car; yet largely more than this increase of pay for the car would be saved in the decrease of pay by weight. All the weight exceeding five thousand pounds a mile per annum is carried at the rate of $20 a ton, whereas for amounts less than five thousand pounds down to two hundred pounds a mile per annum the rate is from three to ten times more.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will not enter into a discussion on that question with my friend except to state that while the pay is less per pound where the amount of mail is increased, yet the increase of the postal-car service brings in an item for the space in the postal cars.

But there is no need of any disagreement between my friend from Illinois and myself on this subject. In the first place the information the committee has is that the Department pride themselves greatly on the service. They say they have now the best service in the world; that the appropriation in this bill for 1880 is quite all they want. They do not ask any more; they take no issue with us on this subject. So, then, conceding my friend is right in his proposition, they should have all they want. I take pleasure in saying to him our information is the Department is satisfied, and I think the appropriation here is a liberal one.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. And that the amount appropriated for postal-car service is proper?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir; and I am glad the gentleman directed my attention to that subject.

Mr. WADDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. WADDELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether under his amendment in reference to the postal-car service the Postmaster-General will not have absolute discretion to put on postal-car service in any part of the country he pleases and to take it off in any part of the country he pleases, and whether, that being the case, under his amendment the report of the Postmaster-General will or will not show where that service has been put on and where it has been taken off, and where and how it has been increased?

Mr. BLOUNT. It will not. The suggestion my friend from North Carolina makes is a good one, to wit, that the report of the Postmaster-General ought to show each year exactly where this postal-car service is. This House when it appropriates money should know in detail exactly how that money has been expended by the officers of the Executive Department. There is at this time absolute discretion in reference to the whole matter of postal-car service. It has been exercised to such an extent that during the last fiscal year railroads were denied service and stage-coaches were running alongside those railroads in order that this money might be taken for the purpose of putting postal cars on great lines of railways.

Mr. WADDELL. In order there might be some provision in that regard was the object of my question.

Mr. BLOUNT. We could not in an appropriation bill hope to get up a code on this subject. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads undoubtedly would feel they could do it much better than we could, and that, too, is the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations. Therefore we have left it to that committee, trusting they will attend to it. So far as I am concerned I shall make no point of order on any legislation which the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads or any other member of it may propose in the line just suggested. I do not suppose any other member of the Committee on Appropriations will raise the point of order, because we are all anxious to get at what is right in the prosecution of this important branch of the public service.

In the matter of the steamboat service the Department asked for the sum of $5,900,000.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question—and perhaps it will be as well to ask it here as in any other place—and that is whether the committee are able to state the amount per mile being paid for postal-car service by the Department?

Mr. BLOUNT. The statute provides exactly what it shall be, and the gentleman from Texas, by reference to the Revised Statutes, can have the information he seeks. For a given length so much per mile per car per annum is paid, the price being as the road is longer or shorter. The exact figures I do not have in my mind just now, but my friend can obtain them by reference to the Revised Statutes.

Mr. REAGAN. In view of the enormous increase of this class of service it seems to me the committee should be able to state exactly how much we are now paying on the leading lines of railway at least.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to say to my friend the committee did inquire and were anxious to know, but this service has been conducted in such a way, so commingled with railroad transportation, that no such information as that which he seeks is to be found in the report. There was no time in this short session for the Department to gather that information, and that is an additional reason why we desire this service separated in order to provide for detailed statements in reference to every branch of the postal service to be presented in reports hereafter to be made, so we may legislate more intelligently.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say one word. By the act of Congress of 1873, this service sprang forward in one year a million and a half of dollars, and this increase goes on. At that time the maximum that could be paid was $375 a mile. By that act over a thousand dollars a mile was allowed, and still it goes on increasing.

Mr. BLOUNT. It goes on increasing, notwithstanding this House during the Forty-fourth Congress cut down the pay 10 per cent., and it is cut down this Congress 5 per cent. In order that I may answer the gentleman's question, I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read the provision of law in reference to the pay of postal-car service.

Mr. REAGAN. If the committee would advise the House why it is the service is increased so largely while appropriation bills reduce the pay, it would be a matter of useful information.

Mr. BLOUNT. It grows out of the fact that we are yearly increasing in population, adding constantly to our material interests, increasing in business year by year, because we do not stand still but are ever pushing forward. During the last year there were about twenty-five hundred additional miles of railroad transportation. In 1880 the Department tell us they will have four thousand miles of new railroad, and an increase of about several thousand miles of star-route service.

If my friend will look the matter up he will find that every year from the beginning of the Government almost, except the interruption during the war and the withdrawal of the service South, the railway service has been steadily increasing, and in the nature of things must increase in extent as we increase in wealth and population.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not think I have been rightly apprehended by the gentleman. I did not mean to inquire whether the aggregate of postal service increased or not, but I wanted to submit the inquiry, how it is that this enormous expense on any given route—not on the general service, but how this enormous increase of expense on any particular route has arisen when the committee informs us year by year, it is reducing the rate of expense.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Is it not by the increase of mail matter—the increase of the number of pounds?

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman from Texas will take the reports for any given year and examine the railroads where the pay has been readjusted, he will find an increase of several hundred thousand dollars on account of the increased weight of the mails.

I will say this here, Mr. Chairman, that for one I do not believe we have yet reached the rate that we ought to reach in the compensation of railroads. I have in my hand the report of the special commission on railway mail transportation, in which, after summing up the great railroads of the country, they say, referring to the statistics they have accumulated, those statistics show that the profit above operating expense on all business is 60 per cent., on passenger business 43 per cent., and on freight business 67 per cent.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not quite comprehend that.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman was referring to the cost of transporting the mail. I say that the Government is paying higher rates than individuals are for freights; that in the report of the special commission on railway mail transportation, after gathering together a great mass of statistics, the following conclusion is reached:

> These statistics show that the profit above operating expenses on all business is 60 per cent., on passenger business 43 per cent., and on freight business 67 per cent.

The report says that the roads from which they have no returns are mostly small roads. The calculation is on the great body of the railroads of the country. And I am quite satisfied that Congress might go further in the reduction of the expense of railway mail transportation; but the session is short; there was but little time to consider it; and for one I did not care to precipitate such a question on the House.

I come now to the matter of the steamboat service. On the 27th day of March, 1878, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General sent a communication to this House containing a comparative exhibit of the steamboat and star services for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, on new letting, as compared with that of 1878. According to this communication the amount for the steamboat service for 1878 was $717,619.24. That same service done in the year 1879, by virtue of better contracts, costs $684,803.24.

This service has been for many years varying slightly; sometimes a little more, at other times a little less; but about the same now as it was in 1871. The committee, determining to be liberal in that matter, increased the appropriation to the amount of $700,000. As compared with the nominal amount of the previous year it was from $717,000 to $700,000; but as compared with the actual cost by virtue of better contracts, $684,803.24 to $700,000; our increase in 1879 was a large increase over previous years.

In the next fiscal year the committee have recommended the largest increase for steamboat service that we have had for the last eight or ten years; the amount of increase being $50,000, and still larger when we come to consider the fact that there is a reduction in the value of all commodities and a reduction in the cost of the transportation of mails by steamboat and by star service in proportion to the general decrease of prices. The Committee on Appropriations have therefore seen fit to content themselves with this large increase.

Sir, I have found, as I have been informed by gentlemen who have been long in the service, that the only sure guide in reference to appropriations is an examination of the history of the service and the studying of the growth of that service. And from that stand-point the steamboat service has had a large increase, much larger than it has had for a long period of time.

Now, sir, we reach the star service, and I call the attention of the House to a statement in the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, which is to me a singular one, and which certainly must have been carelessly made. He says, on page 263:

> The cost of service on star routes, on the 30th of June, 1878, was $5,714,943. The estimate for 1880 is $5,900,000, an increase of $185,057.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the proposition made here is that the increase of the service in 1880 over that of 1878 is represented by the figures $185,057. Is that true? In the very report sent by the same officer to this House during the last spring we find that while as he states the star service amounted to $5,669,132.56, a little less than he has asked, he at that time, in the spring of 1878, made his contracts for the different sections of the country for four years resulting in the change shown by the following figures. The star service for 1878 under the contracts then existing was $5,669,132.56. The present cost of the same service is $4,456,603.45, making a saving under this condition of things in new contracts on the steamboat and star service of $1,245,000 by virtue of new contracts. Deducting the amount saved by new contracts on the steamboat service there is a balance saved of over $1,100,000, by reason of having made better contracts on the star service.

Therefore, sir, instead of this service exceeding, as the Second Assistant Postmaster-General reports, I desire to say to this House that not since star service existed has there been anything like an approach to the increase in the appropriation for the star service during the last fiscal year, and I ask gentlemen who are interested in that star service if they should not at least understand well what the difference is between us before an issue is made.

Mr. MONEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, simply for information?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. Upon what did the committee base their estimate for the star service?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will answer my friend directly; I propose to take up that matter of increase.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken the cost of the service during the year, and taken the increase. These figures are taken from the several reports of the Postmaster-General: In 1872 the increase over 1871 was $262,155; in 1873 the increase over 1872 was $288,872; in 1874 the increase over 1873 was $394,890; in 1875 there was a decrease over 1874; the matter was reversed, of $520,669; in 1876 there was still a reduction, as compared with 1875, of $401,180; making in the years 1875 and 1876 altogether a reduction in the appropriation for star service of $900,000; and, sir, while this was done, this economy, this reduction, simply meant the withdrawal of this amount of money from the great masses of the people and transferring them to the great trunk lines to have what are known as fast mails.

Mr. LUTTRELL. If you will examine carefully you will find that at that time the Post-Office Department broke up what is known as the system of straw bidding. You will find all over the Western Territories that the bidders are carrying daily mails for what it cost before for them to carry the mails weekly.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend is mistaken there.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I happen to know something about this.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. LUTTRELL. On one route from Reading to Roseburgh, in California and Oregon, where they had received $221,000 for service they now perform it for $75,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. If we were to take up the details of every star-route service in this country I do not know where it will end.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is one of the heaviest in the United States.

Mr. BLOUNT. But to end the discussion on that service I want to say to him that if he will inquire of the gentleman who is at the head of inland transportation he will tell him that it grew out of the reduction of the star service. There are gentlemen in the House on both sides who are aware of it.

Mr. LUTTRELL. We have increased the service all over the Western States and Territories.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is true. I have just referred to the reduction and the great improvement under the new contracts. In 1877 there was an increase in the appropriation of $612,429; in 1878 there was an increase over the appropriations of 1877 of $50,000. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] moved an increase during the year of $500,000 in the appropriation, but it was said that the term of service was so short that that amount of money could not be used and there was therefore an increase of only $50,000.

We have, then, for these eight years a total increase of $1,608,346; deducting the decreases and you have a total increase in these seven years of $1,186,497.

Mr. MONEY. What was the date of the reductions?

Mr. BLOUNT. They were made in 1878.

Mr. MONEY. That was the year when the new contracts were made.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; they commenced with that fiscal year and the next fiscal year received the benefit of these new contracts. There was therefore, Mr. Chairman, an average increase during the eight years of $26,642.42. The Committee on Appropriations, in the year 1879, added during that single year for increase of the star service $934,070—I mean that the appropriation for 1879 was an increase over that for 1878 of $934,070. An examination had been made into the cost of the service, into the number of trips per week, into the railroad system, into the star service in each State and Territory of this Union, the result of which is as follows:

Statement showing the average number of trips per week on each mile of star, steamboat, and railroad mail service in the States and Territories for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1860 and 1877.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 3, 1878.

SIR: Herewith you will receive a statement of the average number of trips per week on each mile of star, steamboat, and railroad mail service for the years 1860 and 1877; also the postal receipts and expenditures for the same years.

The number of trips, &c., is arrived at by dividing the length of routes into the total annual transportation; the results are shown in trips and tenths of a trip.

The postal receipts, &c., are compiled from the Auditor's reports for the said years. Items of a general nature, such as amounts paid for foreign mails, mailbags and catchers, expenses of postage-stamps, stamped envelopes and postal cards, mail depredations, and special agents, &c., are not embraced in this statement.

Very respectfully,

THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. JAMES H. BLOUNT,
Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

We found that there were many States in which there was not service enough, not the service that there was before the war, and therefore the committee came up entirely to the demands of this House. The able gentleman whose loss we now mourn, from the State of Texas, (Mr. Schleicher,) insisted that the committee should give not only the increase incident to the natural growth of the service, but that we should go beyond that and make an increase of $1,000,000 in order to have an increase in the number of trips in States and sections that did not have it. The committee came up entirely to the wishes of this House. They came up entirely to the wants of the country.

Now, sir, the Postmaster-General asks for a very large increase, more than was thought necessary, about $410,000.

The committee, inquiring around into many sections, found that where these complaints had existed in a great many of the States the desired service had been given them. The increased cost of the service last year amounted to about $50,000. While there is an increase of the service in the Territories and in some of the States, in the older States of New York, Pennsylvania, and other States the star service has been decreased to the extent of hundreds of miles.

The committee, therefore, have hoped that the large increase during this year would be accepted by this House, not as a natural increase of the service from year to year, but as intended to give the sections that have been neglected for a long period of years the service which they need. The committee took it that the House would not understand that this was a natural increase, but would consider that the committee had been liberal when they gave an increase of $300,000 for 1880, especially when you come to consider the fact that the cost of the service is to be so large a percentage below what it has been heretofore.

Now, in reference to the star service; there has been no branch of the service under the Post-Office Department in which this House is more interested. Wherever there is a railroad, under the law, the mails are carried on it. The gentleman may live in a district traversed by railroads where the mails are carried by the railroad companies, and yet the only request made is for the establishment of post-routes. We therefore find ourselves pressed in relation to this matter.

There must be some intelligent consideration of expenditure; there must be more examination of this question. The Committee on Appropriations have made it carefully from the very best information they could get, and have been influenced by reasons which I trust will appear liberal to this House.

During that time when this large increase was given with a view to increasing the number of trips, a great many of the States had more trips than was contemplated. Even the little Territory of New Mexico had 4.04 trips per week. Wyoming had four trips per week, Dakota had four trips per week, and the little State of Nevada had four trips per week. This scarcity of service did not exist in all the States. This is to be regarded in any action which the House may see fit to take as to this service.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has by its order fixed the limit of general debate upon this bill; it cannot be extended by the committee even by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The bill now under consideration touches the interests of the people more directly and intimately than any other bill that comes before the House for consideration. I am not one of those who sympathize with the theory sometimes advanced that it ought to be the policy of the General Government to make the postal service of the country self-sustaining. I believe that there ought to be but two general considerations taken into view by Congress when deliberating upon this subject. One is the efficiency of the service, and the other is that the service should be made in the highest degree attainable commensurate with all the just wants of the people of the country.

Whatever sum of money shall be found necessary to be appropriated out of the Treasury in order to supplement the ordinary revenues of the Post-Office Department ought to be most cheerfully granted in order to accomplish the end I have indicated. We appropriate large sums of money for the purpose of maintaining other branches of governmental service in the highest degree of efficiency. At the same time those branches do not in any degree so vitally concern the material interests and wants and business and prosperity of the country as this service does.

I desire to say that whenever I find myself compelled to differ from the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] in reference to the amount that he may think sufficient for the complete and adequate service of the post-office in any department, recognizing as I do the ability and diligence which he brings to the consideration of such questions, I hesitate long before I feel like entering my dissent to the conclusions he has reached. I am, however, compelled to-day to dissent from some of his conclusions. I trust I may say here, without unduly exciting the sensibilities of any gentleman on either side of the House, that when the post-office appropriation bill was under consideration last year I had occasion to declare that the amount recommended by that bill would prove insufficient to meet the necessary wants of the service, and would result in a deficiency. I also predicted that in addition to resulting in a deficiency it would also result, in a greater or less degree, in crippling the necessary operations of the service in its different departments.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman on that point, but my recollection is that we agreed as to the amount necessary for railway transportation, but disagreed as to the amount for the postal-car service.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I shall not stop for the purpose of entering into a statement of the items in regard to which I declared that there would be a deficiency. I went on that occasion into an analysis of the items at the last session of Congress, in which I predicted that there would prove to be a deficiency. That prediction has been verified by the experience of the service. In reference to one branch of the service, the post-office clerks, route agents, and local messengers, I declared then that the bill as it was reported would result in a deficiency which would impair the efficiency of the service. The event has justified that prediction. I find by a letter that lies on my table that the Department has already been compelled to discharge ninety-six clerks of various classes, and that during the course of the fiscal year it will be compelled to drop sixty more. This, too, in the face of the fact that to-day there are more than a thousand miles of railroad lines on which there is no postal car, no route agent, no mail agent, and no possibility, without an additional deficiency appropriation beyond the $450,000 which we voted early in the session, of putting any man upon this service. Why should such an injury be done to the postal service when many times the amount needed is spent yearly in paying claims of a questionable character? No reason can be offered as a justification for crippling this service.

The annual average increase of the population of this country is a fraction over 3 per cent. The observation of every member in his own immediate locality will bear out the statement that the post-office business of the country increases almost twice as rapidly as does the population of the country. When we take these facts into consideration I think we must all agree that the estimate of the Postmaster-General giving 8 per cent. as the average annual increase in the expenses of the post-office service is not at all too large. And I want to predict here on the basis of these facts that if this bill, as brought into the House by my distinguished friend from Georgia, should become the law, whoever may happen to be on the Appropriations Committee upon the republican side in the next Congress and in the coming year will be able to make the same statement which I now make with reference to the appropriation bill of last year—that there has been a deficiency found as actually predicted.

Mr. Chairman, the history of the growth of the post-office service in this country is a marvelous one. The service itself, when contrasted with the service of the post-office department of other countries, presents a degree of efficiency that is a matter of just pride to the American people. This service is one in which every man in this country feels a profound interest. It is a great promoter of business and disseminator of intelligence. I sometimes hear it said here that this or that branch of the post-office service especially deserves the fostering care of Congress. I heard it said a few moments ago, by my friend from Georgia, that the star service, so-called, is a service peculiarly dear to the hearts of members. While the star service is important, it is not so important as some other branches of the service.

Mr. Chairman, the postal railway-car service, the star service, and the steamboat service are so interblended that you cannot impair the efficiency of one without, to a greater or less extent, paralyzing the whole.

The heart and center of the whole post-office system for the transportation of mail matter is the post-office railway-car system. It sprang into existence from the necessities and wants of the business community. It started in the great centers of the trade and business of the country. It now radiates over fifty-nine great trunk-lines of railway. It has an annual service over 16,980 miles of railroad line, an actual daily service of 49,134 miles, and an annual service of 17,933,910 miles. It serves as the great distributing center that sends out the mail matter which goes to the other railroads and to the steamboats and to the star lines. If you do anything that shall impair the efficiency of this service you injure the efficiency of every other branch of the service.

The growth of the railway postal-car service of this country is a matter of interesting study. It marks a new epoch in the growth and development of the country. Why, sir, it has existed only about fifteen years. It was started during the fiscal year of 1863-'64, by detailing a few clerks from the post-offices and putting them on the railroad cars as a mere experiment for the purpose of seeing whether it was possible to assist the great post-offices of the large cities in their crowded condition in the distribution of mail matter. This feeble beginning gave little promise of its subsequent growth. The great ability of General Bangs gave maturity and efficiency to the system first set on foot by Armstrong. In the year 1865 there were sixty-four clerks employed in this service, at an expense of $75,000. Without going too much into detail, I desire to call attention to the growth of this service because it is the center, the heart, that sends out into the extremities the mail matter of the country.

During the last year there were deposited in the post-offices of this country about 1,200,000,000 different packages, amounting of course to many times that number of separate pieces of mail matter. Of these 1,200,000,000 packages, 720,000,000, or about two-thirds, passed through the railway postal cars of the country, and were handled on an average three times, being equivalent to 2,215,000,000 pieces handled once, and this by less than twelve hundred clerks. And this was done with but few mistakes and but little delay.

Such efficiency, such rapidity in the dispatch of business is unparalleled in any other department of the public service. To cripple this service or to impair its efficiency would be a crime against the business wants and the intelligence of the country, a crime against those people who submit to the pecuniary burden of supporting this service.

In 1866 the service had grown to eighty-three clerks, at an annual cost of $96,200. In 1867 it was extended to eighteen railroads, having an aggregate length of 4,435 miles. Service was had twice a day on 879 miles, making an aggregate daily service equal to 5,314 miles of railroad line. There were one hundred and sixty clerks employed, at an annual compensation of $187,900. The Postmaster-General makes an estimate to show the comparative cost of this service. He estimates that the mail matter distributed on the postal cars could have been handled without distribution by eighty-six route-agents, costing annually $92,880, making the cost of the postal-car service exceed the other service by $95,020. But it reduced the clerical force in the great distributing offices of the country at least sixty. The annual compensation of these clerks would have amounted to $60,000, thus showing an actual annual increase in the cost of the postal-car service over the old service of $35,000. The gain in the time of carrying mail matter was from twelve to forty-eight hours in favor of the postal-car system. Who can doubt that the value of the service far outweighs the trifling increased cost?

In 1868 the number of railroads on which postal-car service had been placed was twenty-six. The length of the railroad lines was 7,019 miles. The number of clerks was 279, receiving an annual compensation of $329,700.

In 1869 service had been placed on thirty-seven lines of railroad, having an aggregate length of 7,201 miles. The number of clerks employed was 324, receiving an annual compensation of $384,300.

In 1870 the number of railroads on which post-office railway cars had been placed was forty-one, having an aggregate length of 8,252 miles. The number of clerks was 375, receiving an annual compensation of $442,600.

In 1871 service had been placed on forty-seven lines of railroad, having an aggregate length of 11,208 miles. The number of miles of actual daily service was 27,596, and the actual annual service was 10,072,540 miles. The number of clerks employed at $1,400 per annum was 212, at $1,200 per annum was 258, at $1,000 per annum was 43, making the total clerical force 513, receiving an annual compensation of $649,400.

In 1872 there was service placed on fifty-seven railroads, having an aggregate length of 14,117 miles. The number of miles of actual daily service was 33,690. The number of miles of actual annual service was 12,296,850. The number of clerks employed was 267 at $1,400 per annum, 329 at $1,200 per annum, and 53 at $1,000 per annum, making the aggregate clerical force 649, receiving an annual compensation of $821,600.

In 1873 this service was placed on two additional railroad lines, making fifty-nine railroads having postal-car service during this fiscal year. The aggregate length of the railroads was 14,866 miles, having an actual daily service of 34,925 miles and an annual service of 12,747,625. The number of clerks employed was 283 at $1,400 per annum, 379 at $1,200 per annum, and 90 at $1,000 per annum, making the total clerical force 752. The annual compensation was $941,000.

In 1874 the service had been placed on sixty-three railroads having an aggregate length of 16,416 miles. The actual daily service was 39,199 miles, and the actual annual service was 14,307,635. The number of clerks employed was 288 at $1,400 per annum, 465 at $1,200 per annum, and 97 at $1,000, making a total clerical force of 850, with an annual compensation of $1,058,200.

In 1875 the number of railroad lines having post-office railway service was sixty-two. The aggregate number of miles of these lines was 16,932. The actual daily service was 40,109 miles, and the annual service was 14,637,785 miles. The number of clerks employed was 326 at $1,400 per annum, 457 at $1,200 per annum, 117 at $1,000 per annum, and 1 at $840 per annum, making the total clerical force 901. The annual compensation was $1,122,640.

In 1876 the number of railroad lines having railway postal service was sixty-three, and the aggregate length of these lines was 17,713 miles. The actual daily service was 41,671 miles, and the annual service was 15,207,915 miles. The number of clerks employed was 361 at $1,400 per annum, 463 at $1,200 per annum, 216 at $1,000 per annum, 1 at $500 per annum, and 1 at $840 per annum, making the total force 1,042. The annual compensation was $1,278,340.

In 1877 service was placed on one additional route making sixty-four lines, having postal service with an aggregate length of 17,761 miles. The actual daily service was 46,370 miles and the annual service was 16,924,050. The number of clerks employed was 42 at $1,400, 313 at $1,300, 411 at $1,150, 283 at $1,000, and 1 at $500, and 1 at $840, making an aggregate of 1,051. The annual compensation was $1,222,690.

In 1878 postal service was in operation on fifty-nine railroad lines and the aggregate length of the lines having this service was 16,980. The actual daily service was 49,134 miles and the annual service was 17,933,910 miles. The number of clerks employed was 39 at $1,400, 343 at $1,300, 419 at $1,150, 275 at $1,000, and 1 clerk at $900, 1 at $840, and 1 at $500, making an aggregate of 1,081. The annual compensation was $1,260,590.

Such is a brief epitome of the growth of a service which has already revolutionized all the old methods of mail transportation and distribution. Its beneficial influence upon the growth of business and the dissemination of intelligence no one can tell. Let no ruthless hand be laid upon it.

Mr. Chairman, I have no complaint as the bill is now presented in reference to the amount of money appropriated for the post-office railway service. The sum of $1,250,000 is recommended by the bill. The Post-Office Department express the belief, and in that I concur as the result of my judgment and investigation, that this sum will prove sufficient for the next year.

The first item on which there will be a deficiency or else a crippling of the service is in reference to the compensation of clerks in the post-offices of the country. The amount estimated by the Department for that service is the sum of $3,600,000. The amount recommended by the pending bill is $3,460,000. The amount appropriated last year was $3,465,000, $5,000 more than is recommended by the present bill for the next fiscal year. The expenditure for the year 1876 was $3,480,730; for 1877, $3,233,151.60; for 1878, $3,325,498. Notwithstanding the fact that the amount appropriated for the present fiscal year is $5,000 larger than the sum recommended for the next fiscal year, it is insufficient to meet the wants of the service and will operate to the detriment of the public.

There are already more than six hundred meritorious applications for additional clerical service on the files of the Postmaster-General, which he cannot grant by reason of the fact that the appropriation of $3,465,000 for the current fiscal year is insufficient to justify it. Many of these additional clerks are needed at local distributing offices, and the inability to employ them delays the distribution of mail matter and prevents letters and other mail matter reaching their destination as early as they would if an adequate sum of money were appropriated to employ additional clerks.

The next item on which there will be a deficiency and one which cannot be avoided in my judgment is for the transportation of mails by railroads otherwise than by post-office railway-cars. This bill recommends for that purpose $8,715,310. The amount estimated as necessary for that service is $9,000,000. I desire to say, gentlemen of the committee, that you gain nothing in point of economy by hampering the Department by an insufficient appropriation for this service. The law requires the Postmaster-General to carry all mail matter of certain classes fixed by law which shall be deposited in the post-offices. The law requires that compensation shall be paid to railroads for the mail matter they carry, and the rate of compensation for that service is fixed by law. The result is if you make an insufficient appropriation a deficiency must of necessity arise, and while the deficiency arises it has this effect, it hampers and straitens the Postmaster-General in the administration of his office and is an injury to the people who are interested in the postal service.

I have a letter, which in the five-minute debate I shall take occasion to send to the Clerk's desk and have read, giving the data which, in my judgment, demonstrate beyond doubt that the amount recommended by the bill for this item is insufficient to meet the wants of the service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

The next item I desire to call attention to is the one for steamboat service. There need not necessarily be a deficiency created here. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that to-day the steamboat service of the country is costing at a rate equal substantially to the amount recommended for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1880, so that during the next eighteen months it will be utterly impossible to make any enlargement or permit any growth of this branch of the service. It seems to me it needs no argument to demonstrate that this method of treating the postal service of the country by allowing nothing for the increase of that service on the great rivers and lakes during the next eighteen months is a method and treatment unjust to the Department and injurious to the business interests of the country. My own judgment is if we do not put on the fast steamship line between the keys of Florida and Havana, as the Post-Office Department desire, and as I think would be wise, still it will be necessary to increase this item to $800,000 in order to provide even for an increase of less than 8 per cent. in the growth of that service during the fiscal year of 1880.

For route agents the amount recommended by the Department was $1,125,000. The amount recommended by this bill is $1,075,000, $50,000 less than the estimate of the Department. In view of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that already ninety-six men have been discharged from the railway mail service of the country, and in view of the fact that sixty more must be discharged, it seems apparent that the Department speak simply words of truth and soberness when they assure us the service will not bear the cutting down of their estimates by the amount of a single dollar, unless it is the desire of Congress to cripple this branch of the postal service. Such surely cannot be the wish.

For local agents the estimate of the Department is $150,000. This bill recommends $120,000, a very large diminution on the small amount asked, and it is for a service of the very highest importance to the speedy and safe delivery of the mail.

The object of this item, Mr. Chairman, is to employ agents at the more considerable towns along the various lines of railroad carrying mail matter, who shall take charge of the mail-pouches on their delivery from the cars and see to their speedy delivery at the various post-offices to which they are sent.

Unless there is a sufficient sum of money for this service it must be intrusted to the hands of some indifferent, perhaps irresponsible person around the depot, who may be in the service of the railroad company and who feels no interest and no especial responsibility in seeing to the prompt and efficient dispatch of this sort of business.

There is one further item, namely, for mail messengers, to which there ought to be an addition. All the additions that I would recommend to this bill would not amount to more than $500,000. It would, in my judgment, greatly aid the Department in the efficient performance of the various and important services committed to its care. Without the increase I ask for the service will be clogged and fettered. With it the service will move along smoothly and promptly meet every public want. And I submit, reaching as this service does into every city and town and hamlet of the country; reaching every man, woman, and child of the country, it is hardly consistent with the importance of the subject to be haggling in reference to making an appropriation sufficiently large so as that this vital interest of the country shall not be crippled in any direction. I know that there is no other subject for which the people would more gladly see their representatives vote every dollar that is needed in order that this service may be fostered and enlarged to meet every want of the business men of the country. And while we are making large appropriations in other directions we can afford here, I submit to gentlemen of the committee, to add half a million of dollars to this bill, so that we shall not be confronted on the one hand with a deficiency next year, and on the other hand that we shall not be met with the constant complaint of the head of this great Department that he is hampered and tied down so that he cannot make this great service as efficient as the business interests of the country demand. Let us save in other places where the most vital interests of the people will not suffer by our false economy.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Here the committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, informing the House that the President had approved bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 4234) to provide that all pensions on account of death, or wounds received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, which have been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall commence from the date of death or discharge from the service of the United States; for the payments of arrears of pensions, and other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 5808) to facilitate the refunding the national debt.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The time appointed for general debate by order of the House has expired. The Clerk will now read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, and read the following paragraph:

For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $3,460,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$3,460,000" and insert "$3,515,000;" so that it will read:
For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $3,515,000.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has offered an amendment and is entitled to the floor. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana hereafter.

Mr. BLOUNT. When the gentleman from Indiana was discussing this portion of the bill I sought to interrupt him, as I thought he might not understand that there is an error here in the bill in the appropriation for clerks in post-offices. As printed in the bill the amount is $3,460,000, being $5,000 less than the amount for the current year. The committee added the sum of $50,000 to the expenditure for the past fiscal year. The previous year there had been a decrease, and this had grown to a certain extent out of the fact that there had been a decrease in the salaries of employés of the Government, a decrease in the price of labor, a decrease in the price of everything. But we especially declined to increase it beyond this amount, because we found a very large proportion of the mails which had been in the hands of clerks of post-offices heretofore for the purposes of distribution were now distributed in the postal cars themselves. The committee thought this increase was quite ample. I hope, therefore, the House will confine the increase to the amendment, which is simply a correction of the bill as printed.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I offer as an amendment to the amendment what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$515,000" and insert "$600,000;" so that it will read:
For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $3,600,000.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to say a word upon that amendment. That is the amount estimated for by the Post-Office Department, and the estimate is made very close. We appropriated last year the sum of $3,465,000.

There are now more than six hundred meritorious applications for clerical service on the files of the Post-Office Department. Many of these clerks are needed at post-offices in various sections of the country that are charged with the distribution of the mails. The result of the inability of the Department to furnish this clerical service is an actual delay in the distribution of mail matter.

On that subject I send to the desk and desire to have read a portion of a letter which I received on yesterday from the honorable the Postmaster-General, addressed to him by the First-Assistant Postmaster-General. I ask the Clerk to read the portion I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

The estimate for clerks in post-offices is $3,600,000, while the amount proposed by the committee is said to be $3,540,000. The current appropriation is $3,465,000. This item has been for the past two or three years one of much concern to the Department. Postmasters in various parts of the country have, during this time, complained that their allowances for clerical service were insufficient, and have applied for additional sums. Other postmasters, who have no allowances for separating purposes, have urged the absolute necessity of small amounts being granted them to enable them to properly dispose of the business of their respective offices. The number of meritorious applications of this nature now on the files of this office, not acted upon for want of sufficient means, is believed to be at least six hundred. In addition to these ordinary requests, within the past few months many applications have been received from the larger post-offices for special allowances for clerical service in order to dispose of the constantly increasing business caused by the registration of third-class mail matter. The most of these requests have been so urgent that they could not be refused; and, as a consequence, the bureau already finds its resources for the current fiscal year in this regard seriously crippled. I am confident that justice cannot be done this branch of the service with the amount proposed by the committee. This part of the postal business can, no doubt, be performed, with the amount named; but, if so, it would subject the Department to constant complaints that the postal interests were not properly cared for, as well as embarrass the bureau in its efforts to provide the public with the postal facilities in this respect which it is considered they are entitled to. In my opinion not less than $3,600,000 should be appropriated for this item for the next fiscal year.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I do not desire to add anything further in support of the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. The committee have added $50,000, which makes an addition of about one hundred and fifty men, the average pay of the men being about $300 a man.

The committee have already seen a very large increase of the postal-car system, and a disposition to transfer the work from the post-offices to the postal cars. Moreover, there is a great pressure always for more employés. I do not suppose there is hardly a post-office to be found in the country where there would not be a disposition to increase the clerical force. There is a disposition to employ friends; to yield to importunity; to increase the separating offices by the indirect method of giving them more clerk hire.

When you come to the matter of employés, all the reasons that can be used for increasing the number are brought to bear. The increase is already beyond what it has been for several years past, especially when you come to compare it with the increased postal-car facilities. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments already pending.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I believe a substitute is in order.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I will withdraw my amendment if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I renew it. I only wanted to say a single word about the proposed amendment.

In the main I think the bill reported by the gentleman from Georgia from the committee is a very good one. In this particular, however, I believe that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana should be adopted by the committee.

A year or two ago I co-operated very cheerfully with other members of the House in reducing the salaries of postmasters—they were very materially reduced—but this is burning the candle at both ends. The truth is that clerk hire can only be allowed at offices of the first and second class; and in most of the offices in my State, and I apprehend that it is so generally throughout the country, the allowance for clerk hire under these limited appropriations is not sufficient to pay the absolutely necessary clerk hire.

I have in my mind several post-offices where the postmaster has to draw largely from his reduced salary to pay clerk hire to run his office.

It is the rule and not the exception, and therefore I think that this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that generally I can co-operate with the majority of the committee in the amount recommended in this bill. There are exceptions, however, where I think the appropriations are too small, and this is one of them.

The Department this year and, in fact, all the Departments have been exceedingly careful in the estimates they have made to Congress.

This is especially true of the Post-Office Department. My friend having the bill in charge does not seem to appreciate the fact that this service is constantly growing and that we cannot afford to cripple the Post-Office Department and to deprive the people anywhere of the privilege of the Post-Office Department.

I feel, therefore, from the investigation that I have given this subject, and it has been considerable, that the Postmaster-General is right when he says that he requires $3,600,000.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, as renewed by Mr. CANNON, of Illinois; and on a division there were—ayes 88, noes 45.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 21 members voting therefor.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I give notice that I shall ask for a yea-and-nay vote on this amendment in the House.

The amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For payment to letter-carriers, $1,900,000.

Mr. PAGE. I move to strike out the word "one" and insert "two."

This, Mr. Chairman, is in accordance with the estimate made by the Post-Office Department for $2,000,000. It is well known that this service is rapidly increasing, and I believe it is well known that it more than pays for itself, in fact that it adds revenue to the Government. I hope that the amendment will be adopted for the reason that this service is becoming very popular and is one which the people of the whole country are more or less interested in.

So far as my own State is concerned, I believe that there are but two cities having a population of over forty thousand as now provided for by law, and if the service is to be extended at all I do not think this increase is extravagant. There is only a difference between it and the amount appropriated by the bill of $100,000, and therefore I hope the amount asked for by the Department will be voted for by the House.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. This is a new branch of the service, and during its existence, which has been only I believe for fifteen years, it has grown to be self-sustaining, and is about the only branch of the service that actually pays a revenue into the Treasury. It is to be extended. The cities are demanding it, and it cannot be extended without increased facilities, and as I said wherever the system is adopted and established we find that the revenue increases from year to year, and this year it is estimated to pay an actual profit of half a million dollars into the Treasury; and so long as that is the case the carriers should have a fair compensation and be sufficiently numerous to do the work properly, and the new towns and cities that desire to have the system should be provided for. I send to the Clerk's desk a communication to be read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to state, in compliance with your instructions, that the estimate of $2,000,000 submitted to Congress for the free-delivery service of this Department for the next fiscal year is urgently needed to meet the business requirements of the public in the eighty-eight cities where this service is now in operation, and to extend it to several other cities having the population entitling them to it under the law.

The necessity for enlarged appropriations will be apparent from the following statement of facts: The appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, was $1,900,000; for the year 1876, $2,000,000; for the year 1877, $1,900,000, (a reduction of $100,000;) for the year 1878, $1,825,000, (a reduction of $75,000;) for the year 1879, (present year,) $1,875,000, an increase of $50,000 over the preceding year, but still $125,000 less than for the year 1876, and $25,000 less than for the year 1875.

The year 1878 as compared with 1875 presents the following exhibit: The number of free-delivery offices, 87, same as in 1875; number of carriers, 2,275, against 2,195 in 1875; whole number of pieces of mail matter handled by carriers, 715,782,150, against 574,201,474 in 1875; cost of service in 1878, $1,824,166.96, against $1,880,041.99 in 1875, ($55,875.03 less than in 1875;) amount of postage on local matter alone, $2,452,251.51, against $1,947,559.54 in 1875, (an increase of $504,691.97;) excess of postage on local matter alone over the cost of the service, $628,084.55 in 1878, against $67,517.55 over cost of the service in 1875.

The increase in the service and reduction in the expenses were reached by the diminished appropriations, which obliged the Department to reduce the number of carriers or their salaries. The latter alternative was adopted on two occasions to preserve the efficiency of the service and meet the demands of the public; but, in my judgment, the pay of carriers should not be further reduced.

It must be expected that the wants of the service will increase year by year with the growth of cities and the multiplication of business enterprises, and that the requirements of the public cannot be met without increased appropriations.

Very respectfully, &c.,

R. W. GURLEY,
Superintendent Free-Delivery System.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Surely my time has not expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has more than expired, and the Postmaster-General had five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of obtaining some information. I wish to ask the gentleman who reports this bill whether in making the appropriation the committee has taken into consideration the fact that this House late in the last session by an overwhelming majority passed a bill increasing the pay and providing for the classification of carriers? That bill is now pending in the Senate, and may at any time come up, and will very likely be passed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will say to the gentleman that we have not taken that bill into consideration. We have not anticipated the action of the Senate on that bill. Whenever the law is changed we will take the change into consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I hope the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] will be adopted. Last year this House, when it had this question under consideration, passed by an almost unanimous vote a bill to increase and not lessen the compensation and number of letter-carriers. It was then argued and it is well known that the postal revenue of those States composing the belt through which the carrier system runs was from one and a half to two millions of dollars more than the amount expended in the service for those States.

This letter-carrier system in the large cities is becoming a profitable thing. The extension of it is but following in the line of every enlightened government of Europe that is affording postal facilities, extending the carrier system wherever practicable. In England it is not simply in the large cities but even in the small ones and in the closely inhabited counties that letters are delivered, even to every hamlet.

We living in the belt of States extending from Massachusetts to Iowa, that belt which brings into the Treasury a vastly increased revenue from the carrier system, certainly claim that we ought to have a right to say something on that question. Last year there were petitions presented here, to the number of one hundred thousand I think, to increase the pay of carriers. Those petitions were signed by the best men in our towns and cities. I think that the Committee on Appropriations, instead of running counter to the wish of the people, instead of trying to cut down what we by a vote under a suspension of the rules declared should be increased, ought at least to give what the Department has estimated for. I therefore hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT. One would think from the earnestness with which gentlemen speak concerning the profits of the free-delivery system that the great city of Chicago, for instance, was actually making money for the Government by that system. The fact is that the Government is expending in Chicago forty-odd thousand dollars more than it receives. Out of over ninety cities of this Union where the free-delivery system obtains but four pay a revenue. The profits from those four cities, distributed among all the others, made the whole system pay. And because the four cities out of ninety-odd pay a profit to the Government, gentlemen from those cities that do not pay are continually parading the fact that with the help of the others the whole system pays.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Having but five minutes I cannot yield. The Postmaster-General has cited the fact that in 1877 and 1878 the amount appropriated for this purpose was less than the amount appropriated in 1876. Now, if gentlemen will take the trouble to go through all these Departments and look at the salaries of all the officials, they will understand that there has been a less amount appropriated for all of the Departments.

The idea of the House in reducing the appropriations was not only because there ought to be a less number of men employed but because a smaller sum of money would supply a larger number of men than was furnished them. A distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts told me only a day or two since that he could obtain laborers for $1 a day now where he was compelled to pay the same laborers $2 a day only last year.

Gentlemen get up here and claim to be full of sympathy for the letter-carriers. Sir, they have my sympathy; but I cannot consent to the principle that because a man is employed in the service of the Government he therefore should be paid a larger amount than the man who is fighting the battle of life in the midst of its necessities.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.] I believe it is time for this Congress to stop legislating as if the intelligence and prosperity of the country were going backward. We are to-day the most prosperous and aggressive people under heaven. We are constantly needing new facilities, more this year perhaps than in any previous year.

I believe we have gone far enough in cutting down salaries and paring down the compensation of honest people employed by the Government. We have gone far enough in tempting disreputable persons to seize upon or seek Government places with the expectation that they may secure some hidden uncovenanted compensation.

In my judgment the letter-carriers are not fairly paid to-day. Gentlemen who do not live in the large cities cannot realize the hardships they suffer and the work they accomplish.

Neither do they realize in discussing this question here the fact that as a rule and in general, the free-delivery system is a great success. I think that this free-delivery system must be extended with the coming prosperity of the country. Moreover, we have at the head of the Post-Office Department a man—not a radical, not a partisan, not a man that our friends on the other side of the House will distrust—to superintend this business. His recommendations should, in my judgment, be considered and adopted in respect to a matter of this sort. He has had experience in this matter of cutting down expenditures; and he comes to Congress to-day and in the letter which has been read explains in language simple and forcible and, in my judgment, unanswerable, the necessity for this increase of money for the payment of the letter-carriers.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman will allow me to ask him how many times daily the mails are delivered in the city of New York?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Four or five times or more; and the more frequent the delivery the greater the profit.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment. I shall be very happy to see the day arrive when there shall be no antagonism to the post-office interest in any part of the country. I call this House to witness that the men who live in the great cities, those whose interests are connected with the sections of the country where the revenue of the post-office is mainly earned, have never for the last four years raised a hand or uttered a word against the extension of the mail service in those sections of the country where it is a heavy burden upon the public purse. On the other hand, there has been a constant outcry against the mail service from those sections, and especially from those States where the revenue of the Post-Office Department is not earned.

The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] for whose notions of economy I have profound respect, asks my friend from Brooklyn [Mr. CHITTENDEN] how many times a day the mail is delivered at his door. I say to the gentleman from Georgia that the more frequently the mail is delivered the more three-cent pieces, or their equivalent, the Treasury receives. It is the frequency and abundance of the mail service, the rapid extension of this means of supplying the public necessities, that makes the service in certain portions of the country pay. Men write oftener, receive letters oftener, and extend their business in particular directions because they can have frequent mail service.

I call my friend from Georgia to witness not only that my voice has never been heard against the extension of the mail service in those parts of the country where it is a burden upon the public purse, but that on the contrary I have spoken in favor of such extension. The mails should go to every cottage in this vast land; and those sections of the country where frequent deliveries increase the revenues to help the Government bear the burdens of the mail service should not be discouraged, but on the contrary they should be dealt with liberally.

Those persons who serve the Government as letter-carriers or other post-office employés are among the hardest-worked men in America. The amount of labor which is performed every twenty-four hours by the clerks in the larger post-offices of this country and by the men who have charge of the mails upon our mail cars is perfectly wonderful. Look into one of those cars and see the work going on. See the rapidity with which the motions of these men are kept up.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I renew the amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] will pardon me for saying that the view which he takes is a narrow one. He says that complaints are made from sections of the country where the mail service does not pay its expenses against sections where it does. Now, that might be replied to by the suggestion that there are other sources of revenue besides the receipts from the mails. The gentleman might institute a comparison between certain States in regard to the internal-revenue service, or in regard to the tariff, or in reference to the various other sources of income. If the public service is to be adjusted in each State on any such consideration as that, this question must take much more scope than the remarks of the gentleman from New York would imply.

But, Mr. Chairman, only a few nights ago the Committee of Ways and Means were seeking to bring in a bill for the purpose of suspending the operation of the sinking-fund act. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that but $6,000,000 have gone to the sinking fund within the past year. The pension bill which has been signed will draw heavily from the Treasury. The expenditures of the Government are growing year by year. The time is at hand when we must use every effort to reduce expenditures, practicing in the public service the same economy and self-denial that are being practiced in the private pursuits of life. Unless we do this we shall be compelled to burden the people of this country with additional taxation.

While the expenditures of the Government are increasing, how about the receipts? Last year they were lower than they were the year before; this year the increase is but small. The expenditures are increasing at a much more rapid rate than the receipts. Unpleasant as it may be, we must in the affairs of Government do as people are doing in the private business of the country; we must apply ourselves to a careful consideration of expenses and reduce them as much as we reasonably can.

If there is any branch of the public service where a reduction can be made, it is certainly this free-delivery system. Labor is less expensive than it was; and for the expenditure which we are now making upon this service we can employ a larger number of men than have heretofore been employed. The reduction on the past year came from an amendment on the other side of the House. I do not desire to make war on any section; but I do think it is the duty of this House to do whatever it can to retrench expenditures.

Mr. BLOUNT. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I may not be able, by any remarks, to influence the action of the Committee of the Whole on this question; and I would not say anything but that I think perhaps the committee is laboring under a mistake as to the facts touching this service. I agree with the gentleman from New York that we have a magnificent service, and the better the service the greater the revenue. But it does not follow that all branches of this service are perfect. It does not follow because we have a good service therefore every proposition to spend money on it is right and proper. I have no war to make on the free-delivery system. In many respects it is admirable. I believe, however, there are some abuses in it. While the general statement has been made, from the Postmaster-General down, that there is a profit from this service, yet that statement is not exactly fair; because in seventy-five or eighty free-delivery offices where the profits amount to $600,000, the members of this committee should take notice that in the city of New York the profit over and above all expenses is over $900,000, so that the other free cities where the free-delivery system exists not only do not pay, but on the contrary consume $300,000 of the profit made in New York City.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that the free-delivery service in the larger cities is indispensable. In cities of seventy-five thousand population and upward it is necessary and indispensable, but in cities with a population of twenty-five thousand or thirty thousand there is no more use for it than for a fifth wheel to a wagon.

As to the salaries paid to letter-carriers, I have nothing to say. The average salary paid in the United States is over $800. Everything considered, they are better paid than route agents or postal clerks. They are better paid, everything considered, by 50 per cent. than people are generally throughout the United States. I have no desire to cut down their salaries. Perhaps they are as low as they ought to be. Perhaps with better times and returning prosperity they may be with propriety increased, but I do not think it is right and proper to increase salaries at this time by taxing men who are not half as well paid throughout the country. That not being the issue, I will not multiply words about it. My opinion is that the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations is sufficient, $1,900,000, and therefore I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, as it has been charged the free-delivery system does not pay in all of the offices, I should like to ask the attention of my friend from Georgia and the committee to this fact: In how many States of this Union does the mail service more than pay for itself? I think in not more than four or five, and in all the other States mails are supplied at the expense of the States in which the service does pay for itself. Yet no one complains of that. It is right; it grows out of the nature of things; they do not pay for any more service in the four or five States than they receive, and for which they are willing to pay. Apply the same rule to the free-delivery system. There are four cities which pay, and pay largely, but they receive the service, and they are willing to pay, and they do not pay for any more service than they receive. Does it follow, therefore, a city in Illinois of thirty thousand or forty thousand population that wants the free-delivery system shall not have it simply because it does not there pay the entire cost of the service?

But as a rule, Mr. Chairman, this free-delivery system pays, and pays handsomely. A moment ago I said the profits approximated half a million of dollars. It really pays over $600,000 above and beyond all expenses. There is no risk in the extension of that service. I venture the prediction that in the cities which do not pay to-day the service will in a few years more than pay its cost. There is no risk, therefore, in extending a service which pays more than it costs. This addition of $100,000 is intended to carry the system to smaller cities and to increase the efficiency in cities where the system is already established. It is not money thrown away, but a good investment.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman from Ohio withdraws his amendment and I renew it for the purpose of saying a word or two. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, we pay our letter-carriers a sufficient sum for the service they render. They are required to perform responsible duties. They handle valuable letters. They carry them from door to door in all our large cities, going to work in the morning at five and six o'clock and remaining until as late as eight, nine, ten, and eleven at night. They not only work during these long hours every day of the week, but they are compelled to work on Sunday as well. They are compelled to work seven days in the week. I do not believe a man is paid for the value of his service who performs eight, twelve, fourteen, or sixteen hours a day of labor when he gets only $1.56 a day. The laboring-man, the mechanic, gets more. The clerk in the Department works only seven or eight hours a day and only six days in the week. The postal clerk and letter-carrier work from daylight until many hours after the sun has gone down.

The letter-carrier has to supply himself with a uniform, he must pay rent, he must pay the gas bill, he must pay his board, he must pay all the expenses a man is required to pay for the support of his family, and beside, what time has this poor man for rest? A few days ago when I was passing through Philadelphia leaving the Girard House at eleven o'clock at night, I met a postal clerk who had gone on duty that morning at five o'clock and was then only on his way home which he would reach at half past eleven, having worked during the entire day and evening for $1.56. I am in favor of paying the laborer every dollar he is worth. I would gladly see the salary of these men increased to a thousand dollars a year. I do not believe any one would begrudge it to them who looked at the subject in a proper light. They certainly perform more responsible service than any one who sits at the clerk's desk. Not one of those clerks perform more responsible duty than these letter-carriers. They work more hours than any member of Congress. They work more hours than any clerk of the Departments. Then, why not pay them all their services are worth? I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word.

I desire to say that for the present fiscal year for this service we appropriated $1,875,000. While this is true, the expenses for this fiscal year in reference to letter-carriers are at the rate of $1,845,000; we propose in this bill $1,900,000.

Mr. DANFORD. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. With pleasure.

Mr. DANFORD. Is not the pay of letter-carriers fixed by law at a certain amount?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is not.

Mr. DANFORD. How is their pay arranged?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is provided that their pay shall not exceed a certain sum; and it is in the discretion of the Postmaster-General to say what they shall be paid, with that limitation.

Mr. McCOOK. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia to mean that the pay of letter-carriers may be involved in this very amendment; that if this amendment be not adopted there may be a reduction of their pay?

Mr. BLOUNT. I cannot say that will be the result. The committee never intended anything of the sort.

Mr. McCOOK. If the pay is not fixed by law it may by the failure to adopt this amendment be reduced? May not that happen?

Mr. DANFORD. This additional amount may be used to increase the pay of the letter-carriers or to extend the service.

Mr. BLOUNT. The additional amount, as I understand, is for an extension of the service.

Mr. DANFORD. Or it may be applied for an increase of pay, according as the Postmaster-General may determine.

Mr. BLOUNT. He may use it in either way according to his discretion. I take it he would use it for an extension of the service. I have before me the postal-laws and regulations, and will read what applies to this matter if the gentleman from Ohio desires it.

Mr. DANFORD. I think I understand it.

The question being taken on Mr. PAGE's amendment to strike out "$1,900,000" and to insert "$2,000,000," there were—ayes 93, noes 68.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PAGE and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 69.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I give notice that I will ask for a yea-and-nay vote on this amendment in the House. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question being put, there were—ayes 74, noes 100.

So the motion that the committee rise was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For wrapping-paper, $18,000.

Mr. WADDELL. I have an amendment here which should have been offered at a point in the bill a few lines back. I think the gentleman in charge of the bill will not object to it. It does not affect the revenues at all.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think it very likely I may agree to the amendment, but I reserve the right to object until I hear it read and explained.

Mr. WADDELL. Then I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be added to the clause in reference to compensation to postmasters.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 32 insert the following:

Provided, That from and after April 1, 1879, the post-office employés on railroads who receive mail matter and cancel the stamps thereon, shall keep an account of the stamps so canceled by them, and the same shall be credited to the postmasters at the stations where such mail matter is placed on the cars respectively in making a basis for fixing the salaries of said postmasters.

Mr. WADDELL. The House will recollect that last year we changed the system by which certain postmasters were compensated by paying them according to the quantity of stamps canceled, not according to the quantity of stamps sold, the former system having been grossly abused and having resulted in robbing the revenue. But since we made that change, as I know by letters from various parts of the country, at small offices on railroads where the postmaster will sell one hundred dollars' worth of stamps in a quarter he does not really cancel more than twenty-five dollars' worth, because people putting off the mailing of their letters to the last moment will run with them to the postal car and hand them to the clerk, there to be canceled. If the postmaster sells as much as one hundred dollars' worth of stamps in a quarter he loses his commission, because, for the reason I have explained, he does not cancel them.

I propose by this amendment to require the postal clerks who receive that stamped matter to keep an account of the matter they cancel and to credit the local postmasters therewith.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can only go back by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not propose to object. I desire to say that the Committee on Appropriations have had no opportunity to consider this amendment, but, speaking for myself only, I think the amendment a proper one.

Mr. REAGAN. It seems to me that the keeping the accounts required by this amendment would cost more than the money that would go to the postmasters thereby. The labor involved in keeping accounts and rendering the reports on the part of the postal-car clerks would be very considerable. It is only to the smaller offices that this would apply, and the amount is so small that it seems to me scarcely necessary to introduce so much machinery to afford compensation for the small number of stamps which might by possibility be canceled on the cars.

The amendment offered by Mr. WADDELL was adopted.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For inland mail transportation, namely: For transportation on star routes, $5,690,633.

Mr. MONEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

In lines 51 and 52, strike out "$5,690,633" and insert "$5,900,000."

Mr. MONEY. The object of this amendment is to place the appropriation at the estimate made by the Postmaster-General. I think that the estimate of the committee was made upon the last quarter's payment, which is an uncertain guide. Many deductions and fines for failures and irregularities in that quarter were remitted and about $100,000 of accounts were not audited. In addition, the committee has not considered that.

We have passed two postal-route bills, adding fifteen hundred and thirty-three new routes to this number in the Southern and Western and far Western States, and the estimate made by the Postmaster-General will be necessary to put those routes in operation. There is reason to expect that by the first session of the next Congress probably seven hundred or eight hundred new routes will be established, for at the first session of the last Congress we made seven hundred and eight new routes. It must be borne in mind that we have ceased to settle our Territories by pioneers, but by colonies. In the course of a single year the valleys of some western rivers are settled from head to mouth; hamlets and villages spring up in the wilderness as if by magic, and these new communities must be supplied with mail facilities, whether the appropriation is sufficient or not.

In other States, especially in the South and West, extensions of routes are necessary and new ones must be operated to meet the growing demand. In one county in my district, a county fifty miles long, there are only three post-offices. A new route has been established, which will give two more offices, but unless provision be made it will be impossible to put them into operation.

I hope the gentlemen of the committee will agree to this amendment because of its necessity to a class of people who are very little cared for by the Government, and who will be cut off from all communication with the world unless we provide for these new routes in this bill.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi will be adopted.

This is the amount asked for by the Postmaster-General, and I am satisfied that it will be hardly adequate to meet the necessity for the increase of the mail service during the next fiscal year.

Every western man on the floor can appreciate the necessity for the star service. The men who have left their eastern homes and gone to the West for the purpose of settling up a new country desire a mail service, and only a few days ago the House passed a post-route bill to establish some fifteen hundred new routes. This sum is necessary to put the service on those routes.

I am informed by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that it will be impossible to increase the postal service or establish routes unless the appropriation is made in accordance with the estimates of the Postmaster-General.

This is a question that appeals directly to every southern and western Representative on this floor. While I have always been willing to vote for whatever the House or the Postmaster-General deems necessary for the purpose of carrying the mails upon cars and upon steamboats, I now ask this House to stand by the section of the country that will be benefited by this appropriation. We have stood by you upon the votes before taken, and we now ask the members from New York and Pennsylvania to stand by the West and South in this matter, which I believe to be necessary in order to extend mail facilities to the West and South.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Mississippi asks an increase of this appropriation because of the fact, as he says, that fourteen hundred new routes were established by the two post-route bills that have been passed. The gentleman is unable to tell this House how many miles of railroad service there are; no figures are given by him except just this loose statement.

It is stated here by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General says that the amount reported in this bill is not enough for this purpose; and yet no calculation has been made and no information given to the House as to the increase of the service. I undertake to say that no approximation can be made from any information given us by the Department or coming from any other source.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. BLOUNT. No; I have not time. The gentleman has appealed to this House to stand by him; he has appealed to sections to stand by him on account of his previous votes. I have shown that when his own party was in power in this House and had control of these expenditures the increase per annum for eight years was but little over $20,000. Last year the Committee on Appropriations gave an increased appropriation for this purpose of $900,000, nearly as much as had been given by the republican party in eight years. Yet an appeal is made to this House now to give the service all that the Postmaster-General has demanded.

We propose in this bill to give an additional $300,000. In two years we give an amount far beyond what the other side of the House saw fit to give in eight years. This side of the House having the responsibility upon itself is asked to increase this bill to the fullest amount demanded by the Postmaster-General.

To me it is an ungracious service; to the Committee on Appropriations it is an ungracious duty. Yet, disagreeable as it may be, I shall urge this House to stand by the committee, and, at least, not wipe out the record that we have made here after a hard struggle for years. We give this year $300,000 additional; last year we gave $900,000, or $1,200,000 in two years. I urge this side of the House to stand by the committee in what I conceive to be a liberal increase of the service.

Mr. REAGAN. I sympathize with the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who is always engaged in a struggle for economy and for a limitation of the appropriations. There should, however, be a discrimination in judgment as to where the limitation upon our appropriations should be made.

We are advised by the gentleman from Georgia that there has been a great increase in the appropriations for the star service during the last two or three years. It was but last year, if I remember, that repeated applications were made to the Department for the establishment of lines of star service, which were indispensably necessary to the convenience of the people, and we were told by the Department that it could not be done for want of money.

Mr. BLOUNT. There were hundreds of thousands of dollars last year unexpended.

Mr. REAGAN. Let the gentleman take the floor after I get through and make his speech then. I am referring to facts which we all know affect the interest of our people. We were refused the establishment of new routes of star service, which were necessary for the convenience of the country, for the want of money.

If the gentleman is anxious for economy, there is an item in this bill immediately following the one under consideration which appropriates for railroad service $8,715,310. That is not all that is in this bill for that branch of the service. I have aggregated the items contained in this bill connected with that service, and they amount to $13,565,310. There is no decrease proposed in the appropriation for that branch of the service. Whatever amount is demanded by the Department of Congress in favor of that branch of the service which has strong counsel and able advocates is sure to be given. But the people in sections of the country rapidly settling up on the remote frontiers who want mail service once a week are to be deprived of it because of the necessity for economy. They are to be denied service on post-routes, although it will cost but a trifling sum in order to give them the mails once a week, because of the necessity for economy.

I am inclined to think that it is better that the Department should not be crippled as it was last year, and that we should adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. I dislike to differ with the Committee on Appropriations when they have investigated a subject and made a unanimous report upon it. But I believe the Postmaster-General and his assistants after years of study understand the wants of the people as well as our committee does. The Department understands this matter thoroughly. It has devoted years of study to it. Why should we call upon the Department for information and then repudiate that information when we have received it?

I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY.] We of the Post-Office Committee understand this matter; we have made it a study; we believe this increase is necessary. I think the members of our committee are a unit on that point.

Mr. ATKINS. What reason has the gentleman for accepting the opinion of the Postmaster-General without question?

Mr. LUTTRELL. My reason is that the Postmaster-General has come here to this House and recommended certain appropriations for the postal service, and I do not think the Committee on Appropriations without any reason should cut down the amount which he asked for.

I want to say this much; but a few years ago you in this section of the country had your star service. But time and progress and the ingenuity and industry of the American citizen have crowded out your star service from this part of the country until now it is far out on the frontier.

This star service is for the benefit of the far-off States and Territories like Texas, New Mexico, Oregon, Colorado, Dakota, and Wyoming. Those pioneers of the western frontier who are to be benefited by this appropriation have within the last few years added to the commerce of the world over $2,000,000,000. Our sons and our brothers have gone forth and built up their settlements, and are inviting the people of the older States to join them. Why should we deny to them the privileges of the mail service?

We expect that a few years hence our section of country will have grown in population to such an extent that we shall be justified in coming here and asking you for an extension of the letter-carrier system. We expect then to have all along the Rocky Mountains cities where we now have the star service. As Alexander of old had no more worlds to conquer, so we expect that in a few years there will be no more countries to discover; and for Heaven's sake, until that time comes, give us an opportunity to receive our letters and our newspapers.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in behalf of the interests of the settlers in my Territory and other Western Territories. I believe it to be absolutely necessary that this appropriation should be increased as proposed beyond the recommendation of the committee. In the Territory of Idaho, that I have the honor to represent, there is a town of Gibbonsville, established last year as a mining camp. I have gone to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General asking for special service for forty miles to accommodate that new settlement. It has one hundred and thirteen people, and last summer there were between two hundred and three hundred there. By next May there will be over four hundred people there. They are now paying, and have been for the last three months, a contribution of $90 a month, raised among themselves, in order to have their mails brought to their neighborhood once a week. A post-office has been established there, but there is no money to put on the special service and they have had to make this contribution out of their hard earnings.

You gentlemen who live in the cities must have your mails delivered three or four times a day by letter-carriers; and this advantage you enjoy without any expense beyond the two or three cents postage on your letters sent. But these people in the Territory of Idaho must pay from a half dollar to a dollar a month because you are unwilling to extend the star service to meet their wants.

This is but one case among many that I might mention in our Territory. We are asking for special star service from Oneida to Molall, a distance of thirty-five miles. We want special service there to accommodate a large county of five thousand inhabitants. We want the service extended thirty-five miles from Oneida on the railroad to the county seat, which is now served by a long semi-weekly route from Corinne, Utah. The situation of the people of my Territory is the situation of almost all the settlers in the newer portions of our country.

Mr. CHALMERS. This effort at economy seems to me to be parsimony; and it reminds me of something I read in the story of the Missing Bride. A husband, after spending the night in drunkenness, gambling, and carousing, goes home and finds his wife sewing by the light of two tallow candles. He blows out one of them and says: "Retrenchment must commence somewhere." [Laughter.] Sir, this seems to me to be tallow-candle retrenchment. [Laughter.]

I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. MONEY.]

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, I have so much confidence in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations that I differ from them with a great deal of reluctance; but I feel so deeply the necessity for increasing the amount of this appropriation beyond the recommendation of the committee that I should regard myself as remiss in my public duty if I did not urge the amendment I have offered.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has intimated that I did not know exactly what I was talking about in advocating this amendment; but, if he will excuse me, I claim to be somewhat familiar with the subject under consideration. He says that I did not say whether these new routes to which I referred belonged to the star service. Now, the gentleman knows that they could not belong to any other; for by law every railroad and every navigable river is already declared a post-route; therefore these routes which have been established by route bills must of necessity belong to the star service.

As to how many miles are comprehended in these more than fifteen hundred new routes I am unable to say, nor can anybody else; because no information has been furnished from any quarter on which we can base an estimate. But from the fact that these routes are in the newer portions of the country we may infer with reasonable certainty that they are at least as long as the average star routes.

I have nothing further to say, except that with my knowledge of the postal necessities of the country, derived from my connection with the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, I would have made the amount of this amendment larger but for the fact that I did not think it proper for me to go beyond the estimate of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, I favor this amendment for two reasons. First, because the Postmaster-General (who is not a republican, who is not in political sympathy with this side of the House which is charged with imposing upon the country all sorts of extravagance in years past, but is a democrat) has after due consideration recommended an appropriation to this amount for the star service. I favor the amendment for another reason. It is time for us to stop croaking both as a people and as a Congress. The wheels of this country's prosperity have taken a new turn, and we have plenty of evidence that Congress cannot block them. We have tried to do it and failed. We have railroads increasing by thousands of miles, and wherever there is a railroad there is necessity for the carriage of the mails.

I believe the Postmaster-General has vindicated his character as a competent, patriotic, and loyal citizen, whose judgment on this subject is worthy of being accepted by us. I wish I had time to discuss this question from a commercial point of view, but I am only to treat it as all these questions are treated here, in the most casual way. All these arguments about economy, to which I have listened, seem to me to have mainly a political foundation. I am sorry to see the gentlemen on that side of the House in legislating on this question and in making economic propositions here have more reference to their reputation as economists than they have to the grand, expanding, glorious, irresistible progress of our great country. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. DURHAM. There is no politics in this question, as intimated by my friend who has just taken his seat.

A MEMBER. It was first started by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. DURHAM. Even if it were started by the gentleman from Georgia there is no reason why it should be responded to. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is sufficient for the star service? As a member of the Committee on Appropriations I want to do justice to the railroad service and star service; but my opinion is, and I so voted in the committee, that the estimates sent in by the Postmaster-General, accurate as my friend from New York takes him to be, were too high for both services. So far as my own immediate people are concerned they are interested in both services. They are more interested in the star service than they are in the railroad service, there being no steamboat service in my district; and I hope I can look over this whole broad land and do equal justice to all just as well as I can to my own district.

The trouble about the star service, Mr. Chairman, is simply this: that a vast deal of this money is expended in high contracts just as I believe you pay your railroads too much now for the transportation of the mails. I would that I could give every post-office two mails a day throughout the length and breadth of the land, if the business of the country demanded them. You have the delivery of the mail seven times a day in Brooklyn and New York. They are very glad in some portions of the country if they can get it once a week. I wish I could increase it. It could be increased if the Department would exercise more discretion and prudence in letting out the contracts.

While I am in favor of the star service, I do believe the amount recommended by this committee is ample for that service, as I believe that which has been recommended by this committee for the railroad and steamboat service is ample for that service. I do not want to cripple it. Not at all; I want information to go everywhere and go often. But simply because the head of a Department comes in and asks you for a larger appropriation, I cannot subscribe to the doctrine of my friend from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] that therefore he knows more about it than anybody else, and grant the same. If that were the case, where would our party (if you are going to refer to politics) have been if we had voted appropriations up to the estimates sent in from the various Departments during the last four or five years since the democratic party came into power in the House of Representatives?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Where would the democratic or any other party be that deprived the people of mail service?

Mr. DURHAM. Mail service! There is extravagance in the mail service just as well as in everything else. It is the duty of this House to give what the public service requires, but not a dollar more, and that is what this committee proposes to do.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] some moments ago, when on the floor, said he went last year to the Post-Office Department and asked for star service and could not get it because they said they did not have the money. Now, if the gentleman will examine the report of the Postmaster-General he will find there is now to the credit of the star service, unexpended, $344,419.18. That amount remains unexpended, and is a larger sum than has been given for one year until the last session.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that my experience is not singular——

Mr. BLOUNT. I cannot yield to the gentleman. He refused to be interrupted in his five minutes. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have called attention to that fact to show to the gentleman and to this House upon what reasoning he seeks to ask this House to increase this appropriation.

Then, too, comes my friend from Idaho [Mr. FENN] making complaint. Why, Mr. Chairman, his Territory has more service and more frequently than many of the States of the Union. That little Territory, sparsely settled, far out on the frontier, has more service than many of the States, and yet the Delegate comes here and becomes furious over the economy of the Committee on Appropriations. In answer to what he has said I have only to refer to the existing facts.

Mr. FENN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, I have not time. Such is the character of opposition to this bill which the facts will show is entirely unfounded. Now, in reference to the star service we have made the appropriation in this bill upon what has been expended before. The appropriation is $5,390,673 for this year, and yet up to this time only $4,968,000 have been expended. There is nearly $400,000 yet remaining unexpended for the star service, and to that we have in this bill added $300,000, and notwithstanding this liberal appropriation on the part of the Committee on Appropriations, gentlemen cry out against it. I take it for granted the House will agree the committee has reported an ample appropriation for this service. In addition to the three hundred thousand dollars and odd by which the appropriation is increased, there is to-day unexpended of the appropriation for this year nearly $400,000. We have not proposed to disturb that, and we add to it the sum of $300,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the sort of economy that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] sees fit to meet with an anecdote. The appropriations are more liberal than have been made for years; and I take it for granted if the gentleman had been better informed he would have seen that his anecdote was not applicable.

Mr. RYAN. I offer a pro forma amendment to strike out the last word.

It is true, as has been said by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] that the Department has recently refused in many instances, and perhaps in all cases, to increase the star service. It has refused to do so since it has been admonished by the Committee on Appropriations of a purpose to cut down its estimate for the next fiscal year. The Department foresees that it will not do to increase the star service; that it will not do to put service twice a week upon a route that has had it but once a week unless an appropriation is made that will maintain that increase of service; and that is one reason why, with a credit of $300,000 to the star service, we are now unable to get any increase.

I desire only to state so much in reply to that point made by the gentleman who has charge of this bill. I want now to say one word in reply to what was stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] when he said that a large proportion of the amount of funds appropriated for this service went to pay fraudulent contracts.

Mr. DURHAM. I did not say that.

Mr. RYAN. I think that was implied in what the gentleman said. If the contracts for carrying the mails are now at a fair rate, the expenditure is legitimate and proper; if they are at an undue, exorbitant, and unnecessary rate, and it is the fault of the Department that such is the case, then that can be remedied and it ought to be. But the fact is that at the last letting the rates for carrying the mails were very much below any former rates, and they are as low, perhaps, as a whole, as it is possible to carry the mails of this country.

Most of those who are carrying the mails under existing contracts are to-day carrying them at a loss. This grows out of the increase in competition; and I think we are in no danger of any improper expenditure of money in that direction under the system employed at present by the Department in letting contracts to carry our mails. And there can be no danger resulting from giving the Department what it has asked for this service, so important to every part of this country and especially to that portion of the country that is developing rapidly in business and population.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to oppose the formal amendment. I wish to say a word in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] a while ago in relation to the railroad service, which I had not an opportunity to answer. Gentlemen ought to know that we have made every effort to cut down this service. It was largely increased in 1877 by reason of the importunities of a Senator from the gentleman's own State to carry the mails for hundreds of miles not then supplied; not by reason of insufficient appropriations on the part of the Forty-fourth Congress but by reason of insufficient appropriations on the part of the Forty-third Congress.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] has just stated that the Departments say that they will not give any additional service because of the action of this committee. Why, sir, it has been so every time we have had up an appropriation bill. The alarm was sounded in this House; the attempt was made to create a panic; war was made on the report of the committee; and notwithstanding this you find for 1877-'78 hundreds of thousands of dollars unexpended at the end of the year. Now, again, the attempt is made to alienate the House from this committee by suggestions of this sort; this and nothing more.

There is no reason, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General himself can give no reason why he will not give the additional service; because he has now about $400,000 for that purpose; we do not disturb that, but add to it $300,000, making $700,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 67, noes 107.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered; only 23 members voting therefor, not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question being taken on Mr. MONEY's amendment, it was agreed to—ayes 106, noes 69.

Mr. EDEN. I give notice that I shall demand a vote in the House on that amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 6143) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHLACOOCHEE RIVER.

Mr. DAVIDSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6171) making an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Withlacoochee River, in the State of Florida; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL WHARF AT KEY WEST.

Mr. DAVIDSON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6172) making an appropriation for the erection of a naval wharf at Key West, in the State of Florida; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MARTHA W. CHUBB AND OTHERS.

Mr. McCOOK, (by request,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6173) for the relief of Martha W. Chubb and Mary H. Chubb, and Martha W. Chubb as administratrix of her father, Thomas J. Chubb, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

HERMAN BIGGS.

Mr. McCOOK also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6174) authorizing the President to nominate Herman Biggs to a second lieutenancy in the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GEOLOGICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following concurrent resolution of the House, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, and with the recommendation that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office, 3,000 copies each of volumes 3, 8, and 13 of the final reports of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Department of the Interior; the illustrations to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

The amendments of the Senate were read and concurred in, as follows:

Line 8, strike out "500" where it first occurs and insert "750."
Line 8, strike out "500" where it occurs the second time and insert "375."
Line 9, strike out "500" and insert "375."

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEOGRAPHICAL AND GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported the following concurrent resolution of the House, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, and with the recommendation that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region, being volume 2, Contributions to North American Ethnology, in quarto form; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

The amendments of the Senate were read and concurred in, as follows:

Line 8, strike out "500" and insert "750."
Line 9, strike out "500" and insert "375."
Line 10, strike out "500" and insert "375."

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEY OF ROCKY MOUNTAIN REGION.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported the following concurrent resolution of the House, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, and with the recommendation that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region relating to the geology of the High Plateau of Utah, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations and charts; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution; the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

The amendments of the Senate were read and concurred in, as follows:

Line 8, strike out "500" and insert "750."
Line 9, strike out "500" and insert "375."
Line 10, strike out "500" and insert "375."

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROFESSOR HAYDEN'S SURVEY.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the following concurrent resolution of the House:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed and bound at the Government Printing Office, for the use of the Department of the Interior, 2,000 copies of Professor Hayden's tenth annual report of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories for 1876, uniform with the edition ordered by Congress.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed 1,500 extra copies of the report of Carlile P. Patterson, Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, showing the progress made in the survey of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts during the year ending June 30, 1878; and that the said copies be placed at the service of the said Superintendent for distribution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES OF THE LATE PROFESSOR HENRY.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the following concurrent resolution of the House:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the memorial exercises in honor of Professor Henry, held in the Hall of the House of Representatives on the 16th day of January, 1879, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that 15,000 extra copies of the same be printed in a memorial volume together with such articles as may be furnished by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; 7,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and 5,000 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will state that that is the same number of copies that was printed in the case of the Morse memorial services, and we followed that resolution as nearly as we could.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HAYDEN'S MAPS.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, the following concurrent resolution of the House:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, (the Senate concurring,) That the proper officer having charge thereof shall cause to be published 1,000 copies of Professor Hayden's maps to be sold at the cost thereof and 10 per cent. additional.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert instead thereof:

That whenever the proper officer having charge thereof shall have received a sufficient number of orders for Professor Hayden's Atlas of Colorado, accompanied by the cost price thereof with 10 per cent. additional, to warrant, in his opinion, the expense of putting the plates to press, he shall cause an edition thereof to be published: Provided, however, That the number thus printed shall in no case exceed the number actually ordered and paid for in advance of said publication.

Mr. ATKINS. What will these maps sell at?

Mr. SINGLETON. That depends upon the cost.

Mr. ATKINS. What do you think will be the cost?

Mr. SINGLETON. Oh, I cannot tell that.

Mr. ATKINS. I suppose the gentleman has some estimate of it.

Mr. SINGLETON. It does not matter to the Government what the cost may be; the Government gets the whole cost with 10 per cent. upon it.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NARRATIVE OF POLARIS EXPEDITION.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, a concurrent resolution of the Senate to print the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition.

The resolution was read.

Mr. SINGLETON. The amendment is the same as in the case of the maps; but it may be necessary to say one word about it.

Gentlemen will see that the Public Printer is only authorized to receive money on deposit until he gets enough to indemnify the Government for putting the work to press, and then he charges 10 per cent. over the cost. The Government loses nothing by it, and no harm is done, whatever the cost may be.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman give us any idea what the cost will be?

Mr. SINGLETON. I believe about one dollar and a half.

Mr. MILLS. This is too important a matter to be disposed of in so thin a House, and I move that the House adjourn.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the gentleman presses that motion, I desire to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 248) to divide the southern judicial district of Georgia into two divisions, and for other purposes, was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires in this connection to say that by inadvertence a motion was entered last night to reconsider the commitment by the Speaker of a bill to the Committee of the Whole on a point of order. In the opinion of the Chair it is not competent for the House to act upon such motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish the Chair would state the point a little more fully. It is a new point, and the members of the House should fully understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will restate it. The Chair would have waited until the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was present, but for the fact that the Chair did not feel that it should be permitted to go further without the attention of the House being called to it.

Last night the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill upon which the point of order was raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] that the bill created an office and contemplated an appropriation, and therefore, under the rule, must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. The Chair sustained the point of order, and the bill went to the Committee of the Whole.

Subsequently, (after the present occupant of the chair had left the chair,) and by inadvertence, as the Chair thinks he is authorized to state, the then occupant of the chair entertained the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to reconsider the reference of the bill to the Committee of the Whole, and that motion was entered upon the Journal. The Chair maintains that it is not competent for such a motion to be made and entertained. The Chair holds that a bill which has been sent to the Committe of the Whole under a rule administered by the presiding officer of the House on a point of order cannot be brought back into the House on a motion to reconsider. The House may at the proper time suspend the rule under which the bill was sent to the Committee of the Whole, and discharge the committee from consideration of the same, but in no other way can the bill be brought out of the Committee of the Whole, unless by action of the committee, had therein.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Chair will allow me to add a word, for I think what the Chair has stated is entirely correct. If a bill could be brought out of the Committee of the Whole in the way indicated, then the right of a minority to send a bill to the Committee of the Whole on a point of order could always be defeated by the majority reconsidering the reference after it had been sent to the Committee of the Whole, and in that way the entire force of the rule would be nullified.

The SPEAKER. The Chair maintains (and he is glad to have the concurrence of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in the view he takes) that it is not competent for the House to, as it were, reconsider a rule of the House. The only way to vacate the operation of a rule is to suspend it in manner as provided for in the rules.

Mr. COX, of New York. What becomes of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER?]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is nugatory. The Chair was discharging a ministerial duty in sending that bill to the Committee of the Whole. It cannot be competent for the House, no vote or action ever having been taken upon it in the House, to reconsider.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House cannot reconsider an order of the Speaker which the rules compel him to make.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly the point in a nutshell.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House can reconsider its own action, but not the action of the Speaker.

Mr. BURCHARD. If no point of order is made on the motion to reconsider, and the House by unanimous consent entertains it——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that a ruling of the Chair upon a point of order can be overturned in that way. The remedy is by an appeal from the decision of the Chair, which is provided for by the rules. No such appeal was taken last night when the Chair ruled upon the point of order.

Mr. BURCHARD. The House can do anything by unanimous consent.

Mr. COX, of New York. It cannot overturn a rule by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURCHARD. Oh, yes; we do it every day.

Mr. COX, of New York. Well, that was wrong.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, for three days;

To Mr. WARD, for two days, on account of important business;

To Mr. BROWNE, for one day, on account of important business; and

To Mr. KEIFER, for five days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Unanimous consent was given for the withdrawal of papers, as follows:

To Mr. COLE: The papers accompanying House bill No. 2459, for the relief of Jean Louis Relliet; no adverse report.

To Mr. SWANN: The papers in the case of Howard E. D. Stone; no adverse report.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope the House will vote down that motion.

The question was taken, and it was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 28, noes 32.

Mr. MILLS. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum to decide a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. Then I move a call of the House.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I renew the motion that the House now adjourn.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope the House will vote down that motion. There is but one more resolution from the Committee on Printing besides the one now under consideration, and that is a resolution to authorize the Public Printer to bind the Statistical Atlases, which are now issued in sheets.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 30, noes 43.

POLARIS EXPEDITION.

The question recurred upon the amendment reported from the Committee on Printing to the Senate concurrent resolution in relation to printing the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That whenever the Public Printer shall have received a sufficient number of orders for copies of the Narrative of the Polaris, accompanied by the cost price thereof with 10 per cent. additional, to warrant in his opinion the expense of putting the plates to press, he shall cause an edition thereof to be published: Provided, however, That the number of copies thus at any time printed shall not exceed the number ordered and paid for in advance of said publication.

Mr. SINGLETON. If the House will hear me for a moment I will explain this resolution, so that no man can misunderstand it unless he is determined to do so.

The Senate passed a resolution authorizing the printing of 1,000 copies of the narrative of the Polaris expedition as soon as there should be paid in a sufficient amount of money to defray the expenses with 10 per cent. additional. Our committee find that there is a great demand for this work, (although I consider it of very little value myself,) and hence have concluded that it is best to allow the Public Printer to put the work to press at any time, and for any number of copies, whenever he may have received from those who wish copies sufficient money to pay all the expenses and 10 per cent. additional. Thus the Government can lose nothing; it runs no risk whatever.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the resolution and amendment be laid on the table. There is no quorum present; and we cannot transact business properly.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MILLS, there were—ayes 4, noes 54; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. MILLS. I do not think that the House, with the present sparse attendance, is in a proper condition to do business. This House under the Constitution and laws is constituted of two hundred and ninety-three members.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman from Texas is getting exceedingly fastidious. I am sorry to see that sort of disposition on his part.

Mr. MILLS. I suppose I might have learned economy and fastidiousness from the gentleman from Mississippi, who has given us lessons enough on things of that kind.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman deserved all he ever got. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] will consent to an adjournment.

Mr. SINGLETON. As there is a disposition just now to obstruct the business of the House, I will not press a vote on the resolution at present.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I desire to state that in the RECORD of Saturday in the statement of the vote on the final adjournment on Friday my name is recorded among the absent. I was present and voted in the negative. The omission makes no difference in the result, but at the same time I desire to have the roll corrected. I suppose that in the Journal it is entered in the same way; I am informed that it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal will be amended in that respect. The RECORD will be corrected by the Reporter.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

Mr. HOWE. I ask indulgence to say now that to-morrow, if I can get the floor, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. Mr. SARGENT presented the petition of Mrs. S. D. E. Dowling and other women, of San Diego, California, praying for the passage of an act making effective the anti-polygamy law of 1862; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Astoria, Oregon, in which they represent the urgent necessity for some improvement of the bar at the mouth of the Columbia River. As this is a matter of a very great deal of importance, I ask to have it read. It is short.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope we shall not consume this morning in reading memorials.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall have to insist on its reading. Some five hundred vessels have entered the mouth of this river from all parts of the world in the last two years, and the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Astoria, shows the necessity of some small improvement, not a large improvement, to be made at once. I ask to have the memorial read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the memorial.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, Oregon, would respectfully ask of your honorable body an appropriation of $50,000 to be made by Congress for continuing the survey and improvements of the bar at the mouth of the Columbia River.

Five thousand dollars was appropriated last year for this purpose and the preliminary survey made.

By this survey it was ascertained that the bar was shoaling and there is not now the depth of water in the channels as formerly.

Immediate action is necessary to protect the shipping at this point and to prevent great damage to Oregon and the whole Columbia River basin.

Two hundred and seventy thousand dollars have been spent by the Government to improve the river from Astoria to Portland, and all vessels that can cross the bar without delay during the most favorable times can go to Portland.

During that same time, however, only the $5,000 above spoken of have been expended on the bar, with the exception of one or two surveys for the purpose of making charts, and the bar has gradually shoaled. The harbor inside the mouth is deep enough for the largest vessels that float, and being sheltered would without any improvements except deepening the channel at the entrance make a harbor of refuge.

But it is principally on account of the needs of the commerce of the river that the present appropriation is asked.

Last year one vessel loaded with grain struck the bar going out and sunk at sea, a total loss of vessel and cargo. Another touched in going out and leaked so badly that she put into San Francisco. Other vessels were delayed weeks for a favorable time to get to sea for fear of striking. Vessels are now lying in port loaded waiting for perfectly smooth water to get out, not daring to cross with the least swell on. The American ship R. B. Fuller, 1,360 tons register, has been ready for sea and waiting six weeks. How much longer she will have to wait we do not know. Other vessels are here ready for sea which have waited already a long time.

The delay to a ship is worth from one hundred to one hundred and fifty dollars per day, and to the owners of the cargo $25 per day. The Fuller having been delayed forty-five days, has occasioned a loss of over $4,500 alone. High freights and scarce tonnage will soon result if the bar is not improved, while the farming and whole commercial interests of the Columbia basin will be hampered and injured.

The number of vessels arriving from sea in the space of two years ending August 31, 1876, was four hundred and seventy-four, and the total value of exports for the two years was $11,845,590.27. During the last two years ending August 31, 1878, the number of vessels to arrive, four hundred and ninety-seven; the total value of exports for the same period being $19,105,100.10, an excess of only twenty-three vessels, with nearly double the amount of exports, showing a much larger class of vessels with a much deeper draught of water, and also going to show not only a large business but a rapidly increasing commerce, one that should be fostered and encouraged. The Chamber of Commerce would recommend that the appropriation be so made as to allow the deepening of the south channel by the "scouring process," either directly to sea or by way of the north channel below Sand Island.

That the observations of the currents be continued, if thought necessary by the Secretary of War.

JOHN Q. A. BOWLBY,
President Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a petition signed by a large number of residents of the city and State of New York, praying the passage at the earliest day of a bill for the interchange of subsidiary silver coins and United States notes. It is a bill which was introduced by the honorable Senator from California on my right, [Mr. BOOTH.] I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I have received, and I suppose it is proper still to present, a petition of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions. I move that it lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I present the memorial of James Masterson, of Houston, Texas, praying for the passage of a law conferring authority upon the United States Court of Claims, or some other tribunal, to hear and determine the rights of claimants to their respective interests in the proceeds of the sale of captured or abandoned property taken from citizens of the Southern States during the late war. I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be read.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the United States, respectfully represent that whereas a very large amount of private property was taken during the late war by the authorities of the United States from citizens of the South, under the denomination of captured or abandoned property, the proceeds of which, after paying all expenses of seizure, transportation, and sale, were paid over to the United States Treasury, to be held as a trust, and not the property of the United States: and

Whereas this fund, which has been decided by the highest tribunal of the land, to be held in trust for the owners from whom it was taken, and over fourteen millions of dollars of the fund are still in the Treasury, but no remedy afforded to the owners to establish their rights of property therein by adjudication in court:

Therefore, the undersigned respectfully petition and pray for the enactment of a law conferring authority upon the United States Court of Claims, or some other impartial tribunal, to hear and determine the rights of claimants to their respective interests in said fund and for the recovery of their rights therein, &c.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of Miss D. F. Gibbs and other ladies, of the city of Dubuque, Iowa, praying for the passage of an act making effectual the anti-polygamy law of 1862; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of A. Bliedung and others, citizens of Clayton County, Iowa, praying for a modification of the patent law so as to protect purchasers of articles who have purchased them in open market; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PLUMB presented a resolution of the Kansas City Board of Trade, in favor of opening up the Indian Territory to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of William B. Reed, executor of G. A. W. Randall, deceased, late of Washington City, praying that the tax paid by him for repaving D street and Pennsylvania avenue be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Missouri, on the 20th of January, 1879, in favor of the opening of the Indian Territory in pursuance of the treaties and the passage of the bill introduced in the House by Hon. B. J. FRANKLIN. I ask that these resolutions be read. They are very short.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be reported.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Whereas in our judgment it conclusively appears from the provisions of existing treaties that the Indian Territory can be legally opened to settlement, and that such settlement would tend to the material and moral advancement of the Indians and to the better protection of the rights of persons and property within the limits of the Territory, and that the intelligent and educated portion of the Indians favor such legislation, and that such legislation will not destroy or disturb the autonomy of the tribal organization of the Indians, and that it will the better subserve the preservation of the funds and lands belonging to and owned by them; and

Whereas the dedication of this country to barbarism not only bars inter-communication between the people, commerce, agriculture, and industry of the great West and the citizens of Texas and the southern sea-board, but hermetically shuts out from the softening and enlightened influences of civilization one of the richest, most beautiful and productive regions on the continent; and

Whereas the almost unanimous voice of the citizens affected by this stoppage of interstate commerce protests vigorously against its longer continuance: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Board of Trade of the City of Kansas, Missouri, That the bill introduced into Congress by Hon. B. J. FRANKLIN for the foregoing purposes is specially meritorious and praiseworthy, and that we do heartily indorse the said bill as being wisely in the public interest.

And further, That we are earnestly of the opinion that such legislation as in said bill is proposed would inure to the benefit and advantage of the Indians, to the interest of the citizens of the United States at large, and especially to the inhabitants of the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Colorado, and Texas, and to the development of the material wealth of this vast region of country.

Therefore we do hereby earnestly commend to the attention of our Senators and Representatives in Congress this most important matter, as well as to the Senators and Representatives of neighboring States, and urge upon them the almost imperative necessity of prompt action by the passage of the bill introduced by Hon. B. J. FRANKLIN, or some similar measure, whereby the general interest of the public may be advanced.

H. M. HOLDEN, President.

H. H. MILLER, Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator from Missouri desire shall be made of the memorial?

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not like to antagonize the wish of my friend, but my impression is that the memorial should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator from Iowa is anxious to consider it I have no objection to its going there, and I hope its consideration will prove very profitable to that committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not anxious to have the Committee on Indian Affairs consider it at all. Probably it will not be considered if it goes to that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ROLLINS. I present the memorial of A. H. Cragin and others, owners of property in Washington, District of Columbia, and I desire to have it read; it is but one page.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives:

The undersigned, owners and persons interested in the grounds and improvements opposite the park east of the Capitol, respectfully represent that we have suffered great loss, inconvenience, and injury by reason of the cutting down of the park and First street and the streets leading east therefrom, leaving, in some instances, the foundations of the buildings above the present grade of the streets and wholly without sewerage on First street east, thereby largely reducing the rents and profits from property purchased before the grade was changed.

We therefore respectfully pray that Congress may at its present session grant us relief by providing for proper sewerage on First street east, and for removing the high terraces and embankments upon which our property is situated, and for making safe and secure the foundations of buildings situated in the squares thus injured fronting on First street east and the East Capitol Park.

We would respectfully suggest that Congress has already granted relief to Major McDonald, former assistant secretary of the Senate, on the north side of the park, and to the society owning the colored church on the south side of the park, for similar injuries and damages.

In view, therefore, of these precedents, we respectfully and earnestly request that our grounds be taken for the public use, or that adequate damages be allowed us and improvements made as herein set forth.

A. H. CRAGIN.
R. B. FERGUSON.
DANIEL A. CONNOLLY.
A. C. VAN PATTEN.
N. G. ORDWAY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WATER SUPPLY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. BARNUM. I present a letter from General Meigs in relation to the water supply of Washington City, and ask that it be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read at length.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1879.

DEAR SIR: I submit the following in connection with reports from the commissioners of the District of Columbia and of the engineer in charge of the Washington Aqueduct, which within a few days have been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, upon remedying the difficulties in the present distribution of water to Washington.

The commissioners are of opinion that the best remedy for the deficiency will be to extend the Washington Aqueduct itself by tunnel under Georgetown and the bluffs north of Washington to some point on the northern boundary line of the city; but they apprehend, without surveys, that this would cost $1,000,000.

The engineer in charge of the aqueduct recommends, as the simplest and easiest method of increasing the pressure upon the pipes upon the high grounds, the laying of another thirty-six-inch iron pipe, twenty-eight thousand feet long, from the distributing reservoir to Capitol Hill, which he estimates to cost $398,948, say $400,000, or $14.24 per lineal foot laid. The thirty-six-inch pipe laid six years ago cost, the commissioners report, $426,000.

I have again examined an estimate which I made in May, 1876, of the cost of extending the Washington Aqueduct itself to the bluffs north of the city of Washington by tunneling, and have procured information from the engineers of the new Baltimore water-supply, which was begun in 1875 or 1876, and is now under construction. That supply is by a tunnel twelve feet in diameter and seven and one-half miles in length from the Great Gunpowder Falls to Baltimore. In 1876 I estimated, from the contract prices at which the Baltimore tunnel had been let, that the Washington Aqueduct extension would cost $25 per lineal foot.

I learn that the present actual cost of the Baltimore tunnel, twelve feet in diameter, estimating its average depth below ground at two hundred and seven feet, the shafts in use being from one hundred and twenty-five to two hundred and sixty feet in depth, is $5.05 to $5.50 per cubic yard.

The twelve-foot tunnel, requiring excavation of 4.18 cubic yards of rock, generally hard blue gneiss, costs $23 per lineal foot.

The tunnel for the extension of the Washington Aqueduct would pass through a similar formation. If made eleven feet in diameter, which is the size of the several tunnels through which the Washington Aqueduct now passes and is large enough to permit any part of it to be lined with masonry a foot thick where the rock is too soft to stand without lining it, would require the excavation of 3.52 cubic yards of rock per lineal foot, which, at $5.50 per cubic yard, should cost $19.30 per lineal foot. Seventeen thousand feet of such tunnel would bring the aqueduct from the distributing reservoir to the line of Fourteenth street, and would cost therefore $328,100, or $70,848 less than a thirty-six-inch pipe to Capitol Hill.

Wherever the rock proves so soft as to require lining with masonry it may be presumed that its excavation will be so much cheaper that the saving in these places, which will be few, will suffice to pay for the masonry which should be built of the hard rock furnished by the excavation of the tunnel itself.

The $71,000 saved from the cost of the proposed thirty-six-inch main would build all of the small terminal reservoir necessary, and would lift and relay such portions of the twelve and thirty-inch mains between Georgetown and the distributing reservoir as would be rendered unnecessary in their present position by the construction of this tunnel, which would bring the aqueduct itself to the hill on the city boundary, delivering with a head of one hundred and forty feet, which is thirteen and a half feet above the highest street grade in Washington at Boundary and Fourteenth street, about ten millions of gallons every three hours, while the thirty-six-inch main is estimated to deliver on Capitol Hill, at one hundred and twenty-five feet above tide, only ten millions of gallons in twenty-four hours.

The information I have as to the present actual cost of the Baltimore twelve-foot tunnel, comes from the resident engineer of one of its sections under construction.

An extension of five thousand feet further east will take the aqueduct to the north end of New Jersey avenue at an additional cost of $96,500. But probably it will not be desirable to make this extension for many years yet.

A reservoir at Fourteenth street, near the Columbia College grounds, will have a commanding position, and the pipes already laid will, under this additional pressure, near the city, give a greater supply than now and at a higher level.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General United States Army.

Hon. S. W. DORSEY,
Chairman Senate Committee on the District of Columbia,
Washington, D. C.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This communication will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1584) for the relief of James L. Williams, to report it back. It was evidently referred to that committee by mistake. I move its reference to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 201) proposing an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the payment of claims of disloyal persons for property injured or destroyed in the late war of the rebellion, to report it with an amendment, and to state that the committee on a careful investigation think that the joint resolution as it passed the House is totally inadequate to the objects that the title indicates, and our effort has been to make it complete. I shall move to take it up as soon as I conveniently can.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1583) for the relief of William H. Everett, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1554) relating to printing impressions from portraits and vignettes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 830) granting a pension to Elizabeth Teagarden, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 529) granting a pension to Daniel Middough, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4793) granting a pension to James Mahew, late private in the Twenty-third Battery of Indiana Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4697) granting a pension to Philip Thoen, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James C. Daggett, late private Company E, United States Signal Service, granting an increase of pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1705) granting an increase of pension to James C. Daggett.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 754) granting a pension to James W. Crowley, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WITHERS. I am also instructed by the Committee on Pensions to make an adverse report upon the petition of Elisha M. Luckett, praying to be allowed arrears of pension claimed to be due for services rendered during the Mexican war. This is reported adversely because it is provided for by the general law granting arrears of pension.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 475) granting a pension to William Black, late a private in Company K, First Indiana Heavy Artillery, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1602) granting a pension to Louisa Bainbridge Hoff, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Patrick Bolton, praying to be restored to the pension-roll, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1706) authorizing the retirement of Colonel William H. Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1714) for the relief of the State University of California, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1715) providing for the ascertainment of and compensation for patented inventions used in the Springfield breech-loading system by the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1716) granting a pension to David L. Payne; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1717) for the relief of the legal representatives of George Coggan, late of Oregon, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 25th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 1297) for the protection of dairymen and to prevent deception in the sales of butter and cheese in the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. FERRY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6143) making an appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1479) relating to assessments for special improvements in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. CHAFFEE, Mr. DORSEY, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. WITHERS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. GARLAND submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

NATIONAL OBSERVATORY.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That so much of the report of the Secretary of the Navy as refers to the subject of a new site and buildings for the Naval Observatory, and the report of the commission thereon, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) authorizing the appointment of a commission of scientists to investigate and report upon the establishment and location of an additional national observatory be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs in connection with the resolution just submitted by the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.]

The motion was agreed to.

POST-ROUTE IN MAINE.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post-route from East-Booth Bay to South Bristol, in the State of Maine.

REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. CONKLING submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision of Laws be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for publishing a revision of the statutes of the United States adopted since the date of the existing revision.

MILITARY POST AT EL PASO.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask unanimous consent to take up and put on its passage the bill (S. No. 1662) making an appropriation for the purchase of a site, and for the erection thereon of a military post, at El Paso, Texas. All the military authorities urge its passage, and the bill is reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs. It will take no time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $40,000 for the purchase of the necessary grounds and the erection thereon of a military post, at El Paso, Texas, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill is reported upon the recommendation of all the military officers and upon plans and specifications, and, as I stated, it is the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABOLITION OF VOLUNTEER NAVY.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senate to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5180) to abolish the volunteer navy of the United States.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to organize a board of five line officers of the Navy, none of whom shall be below the grade of captain, whose duty it shall be to make an examination of the line officers now composing the volunteer navy of the United States, which examination shall be such as is required in the examination of officers for promotion; and, further, that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to organize a board of five medical officers of the Navy, none of whom shall be below the grade of lieutenant-commander, whose duty it shall be to make an examination of the eighteen acting and three acting passed assistant surgeons now in the service, should they desire to present themselves, which examination shall be such as is required in the examination of medical officers for admission as assistant surgeons; and in all cases where said board shall find that such officers are professionally, morally, and physically qualified to perform the duties of their position, and shall so report to the Secretary of the Navy, it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States to appoint such officers assistant surgeons in the regular Navy of the United States. And in the cases of officers who may not be found to be either professionally, morally, or physically qualified to discharge the duties of their position, then said officers shall be mustered out of the service of the Government within six months from the passage of this act, with either six months' or one year's pay, as the President may determine: Provided, That in the event of physical disqualification which occurred in the line of duty such officer may, upon the recommendation of a retiring board, be placed upon the retired list, with the pay of officers of like designation in the regular Navy.

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Navy shall not appoint acting assistant surgeons for temporary service, as authorized by section 1411, Revised Statutes, except in case of war.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the passage of this bill will be a great reform in the Navy. It will save a very considerable amount of money each year, and will dispense with officers for whom there is no necessity whatever, but for whose discharge there is claimed to be no law. They were appointed under legislation by which Congress intended that they should be employed on temporary duty; but they have been kept on from year to year until it has become a habit to keep them. They are all, with one exception, medical officers, many of them on waiting orders, and all of them superfluous, as reported by the Secretary of the Navy. The bill provides that these officers shall be examined, if they desire it, and that those who have the professional, moral, and physical qualifications may be received in to the Navy of the United States, the others to be discharged after six months' or one year's pay. It is a House bill, and the substitute which the committee propose makes this difference: by the House bill it is provided that there shall be a board of officers convened. As they are all with one exception medical officers we provide that there shall be a board of medical officers convened in order that it may be strictly ascertained that those who are received into the Navy of the United States have the professional qualifications necessary, and this could only be ascertained by such a board.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PROVIDENCE CUSTOM-HOUSE LOT.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1624) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase land adjacent to the custom-house in the city of Providence, Rhode Island.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase, by contract or condemnation, all that part of the block of land, not already owned by the United States, bounded by South Main street, Crawford street, South Water street, and Custom avenue, if in his judgment the necessities of the public service require, and for this purpose a sum not to exceed $125,000 is appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM MISSOURI.

Mr. COCKRELL. The credentials of my colleague having been presented to the Senate I ask that he be now sworn in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator-elect will advance to the Chair for that purpose.

Mr. SHIELDS advanced to the Vice-President's desk, escorted by Mr. COCKRELL, and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. DAWES, it was Ordered, That the papers on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate in the case of Laban, Heath & Co. be taken therefrom and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CATHARINE AND SOPHIA GERMAIN.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2153.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I feel constrained to call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island calling for the regular order, the Chair must observe it, and the Senate will proceed with the Calendar of general orders, commencing at the point left off at the last call. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Kansas on the first opportunity.

The bill (H. R. No. 1679) for the relief of Catharine and Sophia Germain was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to reserve from that portion of annuities due, or to become due, to Cheyenne Indians, $2,500 for Catharine Germain, aged eighteen years, and $2,500 for Sophia Germain, aged thirteen years, two white children, who were captured in Kansas by the Cheyenne Indians while en route from Georgia to Colorado, and cause the same to be placed to their credit on the books of the Treasury of the United States, to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and use from time to time the income from the same in such manner as he may deem expedient for their maintenance, education, and support until they attain the age of twenty-one years, when the principal and all unexpended interest shall be paid to them.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, in line 18, after the words "provided, that if," to insert "before attaining the age of twenty-one years;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That if, before attaining the age of twenty-one years, either said Catharine Germain or Sophia Germain should die without issue, the whole sum due the decedent shall revert to the survivor; and should both die without issue, the whole sum shall revert to the United States; but if either said Catharine Germain or Sophia Germain, or both, have lawful issue, then, at the death of either parent, the amount due to her in her own right, or which she may have inherited, shall become the inheritance of her own issue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WARREN MITCHELL.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, when the Senate passed from the consideration of the Calendar on Friday last Senate bill No. 855, for the relief of Warren Mitchell, was under consideration. I suppose by the subsequent order of the Senate postponing all previous orders for the consideration of another matter on Friday that bill has lost its place as the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It resumed its original place on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senate will consent, inasmuch as it is so far in the consideration of this bill, to go on with its consideration to a final conclusion. It certainly cannot take much time now to finally dispose of it, and whatever may be the judgment of the Senate I should be very glad to have that judgment pronounced.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposition in that form will require unanimous consent. Unanimous consent is asked that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Warren Mitchell.

Mr. ANTHONY. I cannot consent to have that bill taken up now, because it will occupy the whole of the time that should be devoted to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar.

CAMP DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill (S. No. 740) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department certain parts of the Camp Douglas military reservation, in the Territory of Utah, was announced to be the next on the Calendar.

The bill was read.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the report be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, on the 12th of March, 1878, but before concluding he was interrupted by Mr. PLUMB. I move that the further reading of the report, being merely the exhibit attached to it, be dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator who reported this bill does not appear to be present to make any explanation. It appears instead of a general bill to be a bill for the relief or for the benefit at least of a private individual who has already through trespass enjoyed a very large amount of benefit from the use of lands belonging to the United States. I think that this involves so large an amount that it is worthy of further investigation, certainly of some explanation. I object to its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over under objection.

WARREN MITCHELL.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, as the most obvious means of obtaining fair play in this body, I shall move that the Senate postpone the present and all pending orders and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 855. The bill had been regularly reached on the Calendar; it was regularly under consideration when a motion was made to postpone it, and an old conference report which had just about subsidy enough in it to make it very attractive to this body came up; and if this bill is permitted to pass over at this time it will not be attended to at the present session, I fear. I desire a vote upon it. I therefore move the postponement of the present and all prior orders, to be followed by a motion to take up that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT The Senator from Kentucky moves to postpone the further consideration of the pending order and of all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Warren Mitchell.

The question being put, a division was call for; and there were 23 ayes.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Kentucky suggested that the measure pending at the time this bill was taken up on a previous day in the Senate contained about enough of subsidy in it to be attractive to this body. I do not remember at this time what that measure was; but it seems to me that this claim of Mr. Mitchell has not any great precedence over any other subject that has been before the Senate at this session. Its merits are certainly not so obvious as to give it prominence in the meritorious business of the Senate.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I voted on the previous occasion to take up this bill, and I shall vote for the motion made by the Senator from Kentucky now to postpone all other orders and take up this bill and dispose of it. I do not know what may be the result of this motion. I deem it therefore proper to say that I do not wish it understood that by voting to take up the bill I am to be understood as intending to vote for the passage of the bill. There is perhaps no man in this Senate, on either side of this House, whose convictions are more firmly fixed upon principle to vote against what are known as war claims than myself. I shall vote against them. It will not even need a constitutional amendment to make me vote against them. I shall vote against them because I think they ought not to be paid, and I shall give my reasons for it if the question shall ever come before the Senate in proper form on the passage of this or any other bill of like character. At the same time I think it due to this case, and due to the gentleman, that we should take up his bill and dispose of it. If we are going to pass his claim, it ought to be passed. If we are not going to pass it, he ought to be notified of it, and, especially, as by a solemn vote of the Senate taken last week to take up this bill and dispose of it it was taken up and it lost its place by a motion to consider a conference report, I think it is nothing but fair that we should return to the bill and dispose of it. Therefore I shall vote to take up the bill; but I shall not vote for its passage.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me a single word.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will make the point of order, Mr. President, that the resolution under which the Senate is now acting cannot be postponed except by unanimous consent. It is carrying into effect an order of the Senate.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to say a word before this point is pressed. This bill was up and pressed the other day, and I then desired that we should come to a vote upon it. I voted against its indefinite postponement, because I think we had better dispose of such bills when they are up and discussed. I say this because I have examined the bill and shall feel constrained to vote against its passage, but I am ready to vote to take it up and dispose of it now and let this man know whether he can get relief or not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think the point of order made by the Senator from Rhode Island is well taken. The order has no higher priority than a special order. A majority of the Senate may always control its business. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall probably vote against the bill when it is taken up, but the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREERY] was on the floor for the purpose of making some remarks when we adjourned the other day. I think he should have an opportunity to present the merits of the case affecting the interests of one of his constituents. I hope, therefore, the Senate will consent that the bill be taken up.

Mr. HOAR. I rise simply to a parliamentary inquiry. The ruling just intimated by the Chair is exceedingly important, and it should be understood by the Senate for the government of their future action. I understood that the ruling last session was that the Anthony rule, so called, required unanimous consent to postpone the business which it covered during the morning hour, and that at the present session there has been a vote extending the operation of that rule until half past one daily.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand that to be the import of the resolution, which will be read for information.

Mr. HOAR. I do not rise for the sake of controverting the ruling of the Chair, but that it may be perfectly understood by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands. The rule under which the Senate is acting will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution adopted by the Senate on the 20th instant:

Resolved, That at the conclusion of the morning business each day after this day the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, and continue such consideration until half past one o'clock; and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand this proceeding to be within the morning hour or to have any higher effect than a special order of the Senate which can be postponed by a majority of the Senate at all times.

Mr. MORGAN. I was a member of the committee that reported this bill and in committee I voted against the bill. I see no occasion to change my position at all, and yet I feel that it is a courtesy due to the Senator from Kentucky that I should vote to take it up. I have thought it proper to state that as a member of the committee I was against the bill, but I shall vote to take it up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to state that I did not concur in the report of the minority in this case, but joined with the majority. I desire the case considered, but when it comes to a vote on the question of passage I shall vote against the passage of the bill which has been recommended by the minority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to make a point of order now that everybody has spoken that wishes to, that debate on the merits of a proposition is not in order on a motion to take it up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point is well taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Chair will enforce the rule.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] If he were here, I presume he would vote against taking up this bill, and I should vote to take it up and consider it.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] who are at this moment absent from the Chamber, are paired on this question. Mr. PLUMB would vote "nay," and Mr. BUTLER would vote "yea."

Mr. MERRIMON, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I wish to say that if this is deemed by anybody a political question I propose to withdraw my vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not make that suggestion with any such reference; but word was sent up from below where these gentlemen are occupied that they were paired upon this question. That is all I know about it.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is pretty manifest that the Senator from Vermont treats this as a political question. I therefore ask leave to withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks leave to withdraw his vote, to which the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am in the same position with the Senator from North Carolina in regard to this matter.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 18; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 855) for the relief of Warren Mitchell.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, because I am a Senator from Kentucky and because a just demand is presented in favor of a gentleman who resides in that State, it is deemed altogether appropriate that I should say something in his behalf.

I would have been entirely willing that the discussion should have been confined to the committee who investigated the matter, and would have been content to place myself upon the record, but I know of nothing which should make me ashamed of the conclusion at which I have arrived or afraid to assign the reasons which have carried me to that conclusion.

I have taken small part in the matter of claims since I have been a member of the Senate. Some of them are just, some of them are probably exaggerated in amount, and some may be utterly fictitious and fraudulent; but the one now under consideration is not liable to a suspicion of exaggeration; it is entirely free from the slightest taint of fraud. The balance sheets of the Treasury assign the fixed and definite sum, and the history of the transaction from beginning to end is well understood. The cotton was seized by military order and after deducting all charges was sold for $128,692.22. Since it is conceded on all sides that the Government makes no pretense of right or title to this fund, we are led to inquire what steps have been taken to ascertain the ownership in order that possession might be restored. No one can say that the amount is too insignificant to justify such an inquiry, and few will assert that the Government can afford to keep the money unless after the most diligent search, it fails to find the owner. It is not thus indifferent in collecting its own revenues; but through its army of agents, attorneys, spies, and detectives, it strikes for the last cent. If the Government would inspire all men with an ambition and a determination to pay their honest debts, let it set an example of inflexible fidelity in discharging its own obligations. We believe that the true owner of the cotton claim is now before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question for my own information?

Mr. McCREERY. I will answer your question when I get through if it will suit you as well.

Mr. HOAR. It is on precisely the point the Senator is now making, and I thought it would be agreeable to him.

Mr. McCREERY. I should prefer to proceed and answer the question when I get through. I am going simply to present my views and present them very briefly, as I have made no thorough investigation into the matter. The committee who have investigated the subject can answer questions as to matters of fact better than I can.

Warren Mitchell is a native of Kentucky. He has been too well established in the confidence of the people to render frequent changes of residence necessary, and his labors and his business operations have been confined to the neighborhood and the city of Louisville. By your decision you may entail poverty upon him in his old age; but there is one thing of which you cannot deprive him, and that is the good report which will follow a long life of incorruptible integrity. If he leaves no other inheritance to his family, they can cherish the memory of a character which neither prosperity nor adversity could shake from the solid foundation on which it stood. Louisville and Cincinnati have borne the amplest testimony to his standing, and from a State as remote as Colorado comes a sworn indorsement.

What, then, was the purpose of Warren Mitchell in going across the Federal lines, and how did he go? Did he go forth armed and equipped and covering his movements under the darkness of the night? These are important questions, as malice charged and proven is an essential ingredient of crime. His creditors lived in a loyal State and his debtors lived in the confederated States, and before he could pay his own debts it was necessary that he should make collections. If he had waited awhile a bankrupt's certificate might have relieved him of all his troubles; but that was not exactly according to his notions of the proper way of meeting his just obligations. Like all men at that time who had respect for the authority of the Government, he went straightway to the military headquarters, and he did not go alone. Virgil McKnight went with him, and his presence was a guarantee that there was neither trickery nor deception in the transaction. Virgil McKnight has gone to his grave, but no man in that good old State had more reputation as a man of integrity and no man was more attached to the Union of these States. Upon their representations General Anderson granted the permit, and Mitchell proceeded upon his perilous mission. His success may have surpassed his expectations; at least it furnished the committee occasion to doubt his loyalty, as his cotton was sold for more than the entire amount of his claims. The committee overlooked the important fact that cotton was higher outside than it was inside the confederated States, and that some of this cotton had been purchased before the article had reached its highest price.

To cast additional suspicion upon his loyalty two lines are quoted from a long letter from Judge Ballard, very favorable in other respects, in which he says:

> I do not know what were Mr. Mitchell's views of the rebellion. If he sympathized with it, and I have heard and believe he did, I regret it.

The high position and the high character of Judge Ballard cannot raise this statement above the dignity of hearsay evidence, and it falls to the ground when confronted by the sworn testimony of John B. Lewis, of Denver, Colorado, who saw Mitchell before the rebellion and during the rebellion, and at Louisville and at Nashville heard him express his violent opposition to secession.

No man had more reason to dread conflict than he had. He was not a soldier and had no taste for martial exercises. Diligently engaged in his commercial pursuits, meditating no wrong to others, relying on the law for protection and security, he was suddenly awakened by the cannonading at Sumter to an awful realization of the dangers which threatened destruction to himself and perhaps to his country.

He now sees his claim suspended between a charge of loyalty made by the Supreme Court of the United States and an insinuation of disloyalty in the Senate of the United States. The committee conclude that the disloyalty of the claimant is placed beyond question or doubt by the fact that he was engaged for a short time in pork-packing at Clarksville, Tennessee. It is no part of my purpose to evade the force of established facts, and candor compels the admission that under a sort of moral duress he did superintend that business for a term approaching six weeks.

I am not much of a believer in what are called special providences or the mysterious interposition of divine agencies in the affairs of men. If I were I might find a wonderful illustration in the locality and capacity of the pork-house at Clarksville. The campaign up the Cumberland was a flank movement, rendered successful by constant toil in the presence of constant danger. After the victory at Donelson the veterans of our Army were greatly fatigued and some of them were hungry. Who will describe their satisfaction when the well-stored pork-house at Clarksville disclosed its bountiful supplies? The odor of boiled meat, broiled meat, and fried meat rose from pot, skillet, and frying-pan, and toil and danger were forgotten amid the pleasures of the feast.

Warren Mitchell was opposed to the rebellion from the beginning of the war to the end, and at the age of three score years and ten it looks like grinding oppression to keep his money and send him forth as poor as Lazarus simply because he placed a little fresh pork in a position where it was certain to be taken and consumed by the Army of the Cumberland.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves that the further consideration of the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MITCHELL. As I stated a moment ago, and have stated several times, I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] on this question. If he were here he would vote for the indefinite postponement and I should vote against it, in order that the bill might be considered further.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (after having voted in the negative.) The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] is confined at home by sickness. I do not know how he would vote on this question. I am paired with him, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (after having voted in the negative.) I have to say that if there is any doubt about this matter I will ask to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] on all political questions.

Several SENATORS. This is not political.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Some seem to think it is.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is due that I should make a further statement that this question was spoken of between the Senator from Minnesota and myself, and I am differently situated from other Senators, perhaps, where the question was alluded to between themselves and those with whom they are paired.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am strongly inclined to vote against the bill; but as I am paired on political questions, and this seems to be regarded as a political question, I will observe my pair.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will do the same, then, Mr. President; I withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The vote will be withdrawn.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 24; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky who just now addressed the Senate [Mr. McCREERY] promised that he would answer a question at the conclusion of his remarks. He left the Senate Chamber for a moment, probably having forgotten the promise, and I did not have an opportunity to address it to him.

Mr. McCREERY. I will answer it if I can.

Mr. HOAR. I understood the honorable Senator to state as the foundation of his argument that it was conceded and beyond question that the United States had no title whatever to this cotton, and that the only question therefore was to find the legal owner. I wish to ask the honorable Senator if he understands that this is a part of the large quantity of cotton captured at Savannah by General Sherman when he took that city, and if I am correct in understanding him to affirm that the United States acquired no title to any cotton by that capture, and is bound to restore it or its proceeds to the owners, when ascertained?

Mr. McCREERY. I have understood, so far as the cotton is concerned that belonged to rebels, that has to be restored under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and I was arguing against the distinction against a Union man. That was the point of my argument. I understand that the Supreme Court has decided that if this cotton had belonged to a rebel he could have recovered it from the United States by a suit before the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOAR. Then I understand the Senator from Kentucky does affirm that it is the duty of the United States, in his judgment, to pay all the owners of the cotton captured by Sherman at Savannah the price of the cotton if it was sold and turned into the Treasury.

Mr. MCCREERY. I would rather that the Senator from Massachusetts would understand me to advocate the bill that is before the Senate. I did not undertake to consider any other bill, and I would prefer to be considered as being in favor of the claim now before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall this bill be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I suppose that we had as well meet here as anywhere the question made by this bill. I shall vote against it. I shall vote against it because I think it ought not to pass. I am not driven to this course by what is called policy, because the gentlemen on the other side are seeking to make political capital out of this and like claims. I am influenced by no such consideration. On the contrary, if I were influenced in this case by the precedents which republicans have set us in previous Congresses, I should feel constrained to vote for the passage of this bill. I know that by act of Congress the United States Government have paid some very large claims for cotton seized by General Sherman at Savannah; and if the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] as is implied by the question he propounded to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. MCCREERY,] takes the position that none of the cotton seized by General Sherman at Savannah ought to be paid for by the Government, then the Senator from Massachusetts takes position against the payment of claims that have been allowed by the United States Government and by act of Congress. But I have not investigated to see which way that Senator voted on the question. It would be entertaining and interesting to examine and see how he did vote. One claim for cotton seized at Savannah by General Sherman, amounting to over $500,000, was paid by the votes of a republican Congress when the House and Senate were both I believe about two-thirds republican.

Mr. CONKLING. What case was that?

Mr. HILL. The case of Lamar. That was a very large claim. It certainly had very little loyalty behind it to push it through. I suppose we must conclude that that case was large enough to go through Congress by its own momentum.

Mr. DAWES. Was not that a judgment of the Court of Claims?

Mr. HILL. I have no recollection that it was. It may have been passed upon by the Court of Claims. I do not remember.

Mr. DAWES. I think it was.

Mr. HILL. Certainly there was nothing in that case which made it better than this and many others either before that court or before Congress. I do not know how that got through.

Mr. DAWES. I do not affirm that it was, but I will inquire. I think it was.

Mr. HILL. I only say to the Senator from Massachusetts that whether it went through one tribunal or another, I happen to know it went through under republican auspices. I mention this simply to show that I do not think our friends on the other side should be at this late day exceedingly virtuous on this subject of loyal claims. I have not made the examination. Others profess to have made that examination, and they say not only this claim but claims amounting to a hundred million dollars of like character have been paid by the republican party during the last ten years. I do not know whether they have or not; I am not a man to delve in this kind of records; but certainly we do know that a very large number have been paid amounting to very large sums of money. So if I should follow precedents in this case, the precedents set by gentlemen on the other side, I should feel it my duty to vote for this bill.

I am willing to concede, too, that this gentleman now asking relief at the hands of the Senate is not in the character of a great many others. He is most evidently an honest man from all the evidence I have. I know him but slightly personally; but I have a great many letters from a great many persons in relation to him, and I am satisfied from all the evidence that he is not only an honest man but that he is incapable of preferring a claim before this body, or any body, that he does not believe to be just and right. I believe all that the Senator from Kentucky has said on that subject is correct. So I do not vote against this claim because I have any suspicion that the gentleman who prefers it is any other than an honest, correct man, and that he sincerely believes his claim ought to be paid.

But, Mr. President, I vote against this bill because, in my judgment, it is what we call par excellence a war claim, and I am against the payment of all war claims, whether they be loyal or disloyal, unless it be perhaps some few exceptions in favor of religious, educational, and charitable institutions; and there are very few even of that character that I will except. I vote against their payment upon principle. I have considered this question very carefully, and for a long time, and to-day is the first occasion I have expressed publicly my views upon the subject, because I did not desire to express them until after careful consideration of the question.

Now, why do I vote against this claim? It is, as I have said, emphatically a war claim; that is, it is a claim for compensation by reason of losses incurred during the war and by act of war. My first reason for not voting for it is that we cannot pay all of this kind of claims. They would bankrupt the Government. It is impossible that the Government should be expected to pay all these claims and claims standing on as good footing as this in every respect. If we cannot pay them all, to undertake to pay some is unjust to the rest; it is an unjust discrimination; and why should it be made?

On this subject of loyalty it is a curious spectacle to witness in the Senate of the United States my excellent friends on the other side who are anxious to prove that this gentleman was disloyal, and therefore vote against this claim, and some gentlemen on this side seem exceedingly anxious to prove that he was loyal and therefore will vote for his claim. I shall not trouble myself to consider that question. The question of loyalty is one that must yet receive its definition in this country. It has never yet received it. The word "loyal" as used by gentlemen on the other side, and the word "loyalty" at all, in my judgment, is not a word applicable in a popular government. I do dislike, I confess, to hear it. What do you mean by "loyal?" Do you mean by "loyal" a man who was devoted to the union of the States under the Constitution? If you thus define it, there are thousands, many thousands in the South who are and ever have been loyal in the highest sense. It was an easy matter for gentlemen living in Maine and New York and Massachusetts during the terrible ordeal through which we passed to proclaim their devotion to the Union—a very easy matter. Everybody concurred with them. It would have required some courage for my friend here, [Mr. ALLISON,] in Iowa to have said that he was not for the Union. And where it was such an easy matter to have professed unbounded devotion to the Union, I do not think that such profession has much merit in it. But further down, where the sun was warmer and the feelings were more heated, it required courage when the test was made for a man to say he was devoted to the Union. That man is entitled to some credit, and I do know that there are thousands and tens of thousands who under the most trying ordeal to which human courage was ever subjected, stood up and proclaimed their fidelity to the Union to the last moment. Yes, sir, there were thousands of men throughout the Southern States who were fearlessly defending the preservation of the Union, and resisting the current that was against them, when hundreds and thousands who for years have been loudly blatant in declaring their devotion to the Union where it was safe to do so, would not have dared to open their mouths on that line. Yet these gentlemen up here are par excellence loyal, and those gentlemen down there who fought against secession until it became an accomplished fact and submitted to disunion as they would submit to the death of a father, from necessity only, and then in sorrow and sadness of heart, are denounced as disloyal because they did what they could only do in their conscience or fact, go with their own people when they were determined to go and did go—these men are now held up as disloyal, and Senators in this body are exerting their wits and exhausting their patience and industry to find some little circumstance that may taint somebody with disloyalty for the purpose of defeating his rights! As I say, this question of loyalty has yet to receive a definition. It has not yet received a proper definition, and cannot be properly defined until passion shall subside, and sound reason be fully restored.

I know thousands of men who were ready to give everything to prevent the act of secession, who were devoted in their hearts and lives to the preservation of the Union of these States; who felt conscientiously bound under the teachings of their life-time and under the circumstances that surrounded them, compelled as they were necessarily, compelled conscientiously, not by duress, compelled by honest convictions as the result of a policy which they did not approve, to go as they did go; and, sir, I know that they were just as devoted to the Union as gentlemen who in a different climate and on more convenient occasions could safely proclaim their loyalty and who are now denouncing them as disloyal. It is all wrong, Mr. President.

This gentleman I dare say was a Union man. I know thousands of Union men in the South who were never guilty of an act of infidelity to the confederacy and who yet never saw the hour nor the moment that they would not have terminated the war on the basis of honest reunion. They were ready at all times to do it and their sentiments were not concealed, yet they went with their section. Shall we say that this is disloyalty, and that they only were loyal who desired that one section should become the conqueror of another section of a common country? Is that what you mean by loyalty? If you mean by loyalty devotion to the Union, desire to preserve the Union, desire even that the result of the conflict on terms honorable to both should be the preservation of the Union—if that is the meaning of loyalty, there are thousands and millions in the South who were loyal and always were loyal. But if you mean by loyalty a desire that one section of a common country should become the conqueror of another section, it will be a fatality for this country if anybody is loyal. I am not ashamed to stand up here and say that I believed the greatest possible calamity that could happen to this country was for one section to become the conqueror of another section of a common country; and yet the sun has never shone for an hour when in my heart of hearts the highest political ambition I ever had was not to see the American Union under the Constitution preserved, perpetuated, and obeyed forever. And yet, sir, there never was an hour when I would not have laid down my life and my all rather than have seen one section of a common country become the conqueror of another section of that same common country, and I believe that the wise men of this country will yet wake up to the fact that the greatest misfortune that has ever befallen us among our many misfortunes is the fact that a successful party to a sectional war obtained immediate and unchecked control of the whole Government over both sections.

So this talk about loyalty and disloyalty has no weight whatever with me in this case. I vote against this bill from higher and different considerations altogether. I say that if the evidences of loyalty in this case are to be accepted as satisfactory, and if that definition of loyalty which I believe is the only proper one is to obtain, then there are thousands of men who have been wronged, reduced to poverty, utter poverty, in the South, who, "in times that tried men's souls," gave higher evidence of devotion to the Union than has been given by equal thousands who are so ready to denounce them as rebels. It is very well for gentlemen who have never been put to the test, it is very well for gentlemen who have never had their courage tried, very well for gentlemen who have never been where it required courage to defend the right as they believed it, very well for gentlemen who could get up in the North and say they were for the Union and receive the undivided plaudits of every listener, very well for gentlemen of that sort to talk about their devotion to the Union and their loyalty, but I tell them their devotion and loyalty has never been tested.

Sir, I have seen men since I have been in the American Congress who have been, on all occasions, parading their devotion to the Union and using every occasion to denounce southern men as disloyal, who, in my heart I believe, if they had lived in the South, would have rivaled William L. Yancey in their devotion to secession. They have the same temperament, the same disposition, the same character of mind, and they would go on whichever side was popular, whether in the North or in the South, perhaps honestly so. The gentleman to whom I have alluded was honest in his convictions. A gentleman of naturally extreme temperament and extreme ways of thinking will take an extreme position in one climate or the other. The people of this country ought to wake up to the conviction that the late war was an honest war; it was a war based upon honest differences. The people of the South had been taught to believe in what was called the sovereignty of the States, but the first people who talked about secession were the people of New England. The North believed one way, the South believed the other. The North was opposed to slavery, the South was in favor of it; but yet the South did not bring the slaves to this country. It was an honest difference of opinion on the powers of government and the rights of property, and each man who was faithful to his own side ought to command the respect of every man on each side and on both sides. I like courage that is exhibited in defense of honest convictions, whether those convictions be right or wrong. I do not like that courage that is loudest when it is safest. Human courage under all circumstances is a thing for human admiration. We are told in classic verse that the very gods look upon it with favor, and I admit that those gallant men of the North, democrats and republicans alike, who met and slew the Hotspur of secession in the day of his vaunted power and strength were the right royal heirs of a truly regal heroism. But these men who, thirteen years after this Hotspur has been dead, are forever exhibiting their Falstaffian courage by sticking their tongue-swords in the thighs of this dead Hotspur for no purpose but to claim underserved rewards and honors from a deluded people, are not entitled to the respect of either gods or men. I do not say that anybody is doing it here, but this perpetual talk about loyalty and disloyalty, this perpetual talk about rebels, is all wrong. It does not come from a magnanimous spirit. Magnanimity in victory is a higher virtue than courage in battle. It is of the very essence of Divinity itself. And why cannot the American people, North and South, wake up to realize the fact that four million, or eight million if you choose to call them so, of people in the South honestly differed on questions of political duty and allegiance with a larger number, twenty millions or more, in the North, and unfortunately went to war on the subject? The war is over; the Union is restored; it is time that we should leave the passions of the war where I propose to leave its losses—behind.

But, Mr. President, I have been betrayed into saying a great deal that I did not intend to say. I merely intended to give my reasons briefly why I cannot vote for this or any other like bill. I will proceed to give another reason. To pay some of these bills and not all of them, is not only unjust in fact but unjust in its effects. Those who are not paid and are equally deserving have to be taxed in order to compensate those who are paid. Now, there are tens of thousands of people in the South who lost everything in the war who were devoted to the Union as far as sentiment could make them devoted, and who were faithless to the Union only in obedience to circumstances they could not control and a power they could not resist. They lost everything. Are you to tax them in order to pay my friend from Kentucky? Why, sir, throughout the South there are thousands upon thousands of soldiers who went to the war and who lost everything, lost their arms, lost their legs, lost their health; many of them lost their lives. They can never get anything for their losses; they will never ask anything for their losses. Nobody in this Hall on either side of it would pretend to pay one of those men or their widows and orphans for their losses. The maimed southern soldier will never come here and ask for a pension; his widow and orphans will never ask for a pension. They accept their losses as the penalty of failure, as brave men ought. Am I to tax these people, these wounded and limping soldiers, their destitute widows and orphans in the South, a great many of whom have nothing but their land and many have not that—am I to tax them for the purpose of paying these claimants that come here and say they must be paid because they are loyal and when my loyal friends on the other side will not believe they were loyal at that? It is not right.

The fact of the business is that the war which we have had in many respects cannot be judged by the rules which have been established for ordinary wars. It was a peculiar war, a war of a sectional character. It was a war between citizens of the same country unfortunately divided by sectional lines. You cannot repair the losses of the war. You could not do it if you were to undertake to do it, and, in my judgment, the sooner our people in the South are taught not to be looking here to Government for the reparation of their losses, the sooner they are taught that the only means by which they can repair their losses is to go to work like honest men and do it by frugality and industry and time, the better it will be for them, the better it will be for the country. The tens of thousands throughout the South who are best entitled to pay viewed from any stand-point, who are the most deserving, who made the greatest sacrifices, who are in the most need, can never get one dollar of compensation, and will never ask one dollar of compensation; and I protest against taxing them to pay a few others who have the ability to come here and worry Congress into granting them compensation. Let the losses of the war go, and if people want to avoid losses by wars in future let them be taught to avoid having wars at all. That is the best way.

I think, sir, all parties ought to take this position. It is a little painful to me to see gentlemen of one party seeking to make political capital out of cases of this kind, and the other side protesting that it is not right. Why not agree to take one common position, that these war losses cannot be paid? The Government is not able to pay them; the Government ought not to pay them, in view of their peculiar character and the circumstances of the war, and the sooner the people are taught that, the better, and let these constant irritations about the payment of war losses cease. As I said, I might make a few exceptions in favor of religious, educational, or charitable institutions, but I should make very few of that sort. Where the property destroyed was of such a character as to be of great public importance and great public benefit, not only to one section of the country, but to all sections of the country, I should think it would be legitimate and proper as a public benefit to pay that kind of loss. There are, I think, perhaps a few cases of that kind, but put them altogether, so far as my knowledge extends, they would not exceed half a million of dollars.

Mr. President, perhaps I ought not to take the time of the Senate, but I will give my idea of the character of these war claims, loyal and disloyal, by an illustration from real incidents. I will give you, first, the character of a claim that will not be paid, and it is a type of many millions. Early in the month of September, 1865, it became necessary for me, in the discharge of a professional engagement, to travel one hundred miles in the immediate track of Sherman's march through Georgia. One day, about two o'clock in the afternoon, I became exceedingly hungry. I said to the youth who was driving the horse: "You must stop at the first favorable opportunity and let me get something to eat." I shall never forget the expression of the young man. "Ah!" says he, "mister, I don't reckon you will find anything you will consider fit to eat in this part of the country; Sherman has been along here." "Well," I said, "but the people in this part of the country live on something, do they not?" "Oh, yes, but I don't hardly know how it is they live; they seem to live, though." "Well," I said, "I can live one day on what they live on constantly, I am pretty sure, and therefore we will stop at the most favorable chance apparent." It was not long before we came to a very good-looking frame dwelling, two stories high, a dwelling of a character very well known in the South, containing six rooms, well built, and indicating in former times a country family well-to-do in the world. The fencing was all gone. The chimneys were standing on the outside, showing that the outhouses had been burned, but there stood the main dwelling; and I said to the young man: "Stop here, and I will see if I can get something to eat;" and I went in. I was met at the door by a very excellent looking lady, modest, but evidently refined and educated, as she turned out to be—a country lady of great hospitality, but with evidence of poverty all around her, and she looked prematurely old. She said to me when I made known my purpose of stopping, "Why, my dear sir, I would be glad to give you anything that I could, but I have nothing that you will have I suppose, nothing that I feel inclined to offer you." "Anything that you have," I said, "will suit me, because I am exceedingly hungry." She said, "I can prepare for you nothing but some potatoes and some eggs, but I have nothing in which to cook the potatoes except the embers; we are in the habit of roasting them in the ashes. I have nothing in which to cook the eggs except the ashes or a broken skillet. I have not a whole piece of furniture or a whole kitchen implement on the premises; everything is broken." She handed me a seat. Said she: "I have handed you the best seat I have, and the back of that is broken as you see." "Why is all this?" "Why," she said, "Sherman's army passed along here and did all this." Well, I told her that I would take the potatoes and eggs, and she put them in the ashes accordingly, and while they were roasting I said to her: "Will you please give me an account of your experience and trials when Sherman's army passed along here?" She said she would. I cannot give it all to the Senate, but certainly it was one of the most interesting narratives I ever listened to in my life.

The lady was one who had married about eight years before the war began. She was well raised and graduated at a female college in Georgia. She and her husband settled that place and built that house; they had about one thousand acres of land, thirty slaves, and all needed personalty, and were entirely out of debt, and perfectly happy. They had had three children born to them, the oldest at the time of my visit being only twelve years old.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to ask whether Warren Mitchell got any of that woman's eggs and potatoes or not. We are trying his case now, not hers.

Mr. HILL. I will come to Warren Mitchell's case. I will show you how it applies to Warren Mitchell's case, but I shall do it in my own way.

It turned out that her husband went into the confederate army and lost his life in one of the battles in Virginia. His remains were brought home and buried in sight of where we were sitting. About a year after her husband was killed in Virginia in the confederate army, Sherman's army passed through Georgia, and all her slaves except one, her cook, called Aunt Millie, left. This Aunt Millie was raised with this lady, and had nursed her in her infancy and was given to her by her father; and she said she would never leave her under any circumstances, and she remained with her. But to make a long story short, everything they had was taken. All the stock, all the provisions were taken away. Everything that could not be carried away was killed or broken or burned, except one cow, two banks of potatoes, and one small crib of corn. The cow was saved by Aunt Millie claiming it as her own, which she did for the purpose of saving it. The corn-crib was saved in this way: the lady sat in her house with her three children and saw everything being burned; seeing the torch about to be applied to the last corn-crib she summoned courage and went out with her babe in her arms and her two little children by her side and said to the officer who seemed to have charge of the sport: "Sir, have you a family at home?" The officer said he had a wife and two children. "What would you think," said she, "if a southern army should pass through your country and take the last mouthful of bread your wife and children had?" The officer was a man. He lifted his hat most gallantly and then said to his squad, "Don't fire that crib," and said to the squad in the garden, "Don't disturb further those potatoes," and that is the way the lady saved the crib of corn and banks of potatoes. In the mean time the squad had gone into the house, pulled down all the pictures, defaced the walls, broke all the furniture, broke everything she had in the shape of kitchen utensils, and carried off all her silver-ware and cutlery. The last she saw they were pulling the covering from the grave of her husband, and supposing they were going to take his body off she fainted away. But Aunt Millie stopped them by telling them "for God's sake not to make war on the dead," and they left. This is a literal fact. That woman had raised a patch of one acre of potatoes and one small field of corn, working with her own hands and aided by this good woman Aunt Millie, and her three little children, and they had lived on that scant allowance from the time Sherman's army passed by until I met her.

Now, that woman will never come here to have her losses repaired; she will never come here with a claim before Congress and ask for compensation. And now I will give you another claim. A few weeks after I took my seat as a member of the other House in the Forty-fourth Congress I received a card one day by a messenger who said that a lady desired to see me in the Speaker's reception room. I went in. She was exceedingly well dressed. She had velvet and diamonds and laces all over her, and the first speech she made to me was to express the great gratification of all Georgians that I had been elected to Congress, "for now," she said, "all Georgians will get their rights." She soon made known the animus of that speech, for in the next sentence she said she had a claim before Congress which she desired me to support, and she knew I would support it because she was a Georgia lady, born and raised in Georgia, and she knew I would support her claim. "Well, who are you? If you were born and raised in Georgia and had losses in Georgia, why are you here in the condition I see you?" "Oh," she said, "when Sherman's army passed through Georgia they destroyed my property, but," she added, "I married one of the Federal officers [laughter] and came North."

Mr. HOAR. She took her revenge in that way. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir. She married a Federal officer. The first woman I mentioned lost her husband in the confederate army, and therefore is disloyal. The second woman married an officer in the Union Army and therefore is loyal! Well, her statement was true because she produced a very complimentary and flattering letter from General Sherman. Evidently the letter was genuine and not dictated by a woman. But I will say in justice to General Sherman that I am satisfied he gave that letter more on account of the woman's husband, who was a Federal officer, than on account of her claim. I assume and believe he did.

But I asked this lady "what is your claim for?" "Why," she said, "for personal property destroyed by Sherman's army." "How much is your claim for?" "Eight hundred thousand dollars," she said, whereupon I became bewildered. Eight hundred thousand dollars of personal property of one person destroyed by the war! Yes, she said, it was well proven, proven by the very officers and men who destroyed it, who set fire to it, and she named quite a number of republicans in the House who she said had promised to vote for her bill; but they had told her it was very important for her to get a democrat, and best of all a southern democrat, to introduce it. Therefore she came to me as a democrat and a southern democrat from her own State—her dear Georgia—to introduce her bill. She said the republicans assured her that if she would get a little re-enforcement from the South and from the democratic party her bill would certainly become a law. I said to the lady, "It will be very difficult to make me believe that the whole county ever at one time had eight hundred thousand dollars' worth of personal property." But she said "It is all proven, it is all right, and the republicans are ready to vote for it." I do not say they were; I can only tell you what the woman said, and as she is loyal you ought to accept her as a good witness. [Laughter.]

Seeing that her entreaties could do no good, she finally said to me that I had to vote for her bill; that she had a great many friends among the newspaper men, and she sometimes wrote for the newspapers herself; and, looking at me with all the air of command and of one having authority, she said "Mr. HILL, if you don't vote for my bill you will never go to the Senate." Thereupon, I made the lady a bow, gave her a flat refusal to have anything to do with her or her bill, and left.

Those are specimens of the character of what you call southern claims. This first claim will never come here; the second and cases like it will always be here; and I saw this same claim of $800,000 for the woman who became loyal by marriage and for whom republicans were ready to vote—I saw the same claim paraded through the northern press in the campaign of 1876 as evidence that if the southern democrats ever did get here in power and the democratic party had the majority, they would take everything there was in the Treasury. Now, should I vote to tax that woman who fed me on the eggs and potatoes to pay this woman in velvet, laces, and diamonds? But this claim, says my friend from Kentucky, is not Mitchell's claim. What is Mitchell's claim, to come to the honest truth of it? I have not an unkind feeling for Mr. Mitchell; I admit he is a good man; but does not everybody in the Senate know that it is a speculative claim? Is it not a mere speculative claim? The woman I spoke of in Georgia lost her living, the living of herself and her little children, and she does not come here to ask you for a dollar. Here is a gentleman, a good gentleman, who went by permission of the military authorities into the South during the war and bought a large amount of cotton by which he hoped to realize a fortune, as you all know. He took the chances of war in his speculation, and the chances were against him. Shall we tax that woman who fed me on the eggs and potatoes and tax the little land that she and her children are working for the purpose of paying these speculative losses of Mr. Mitchell? Would it be right? Would it be just? I will not do it.

All over the South there are hundreds and thousands of people, limping, weak, poor, impoverished by the war, laboring as best they can for a bare sustenance, asking Congress for nothing, not looking to the Government for compensation for their losses, and here and there is some man who has lost something, who has lost some property, or failed to make what he hoped for in some speculative venture, coming here and asking Congress to pay his losses, and that we shall tax these poor people to pay his losses. I for one shall not do it. I am against these bills, therefore, upon principle. I do not need any constitutional amendment to make me vote against them. There will be a great many hard cases, I concede. War is nothing but an ordeal of hard cases. I do not know anything produced by war except hard cases. You cannot repair all those hard cases. Mr. Mitchell has a hard case, but his case is not harder than thousands of others who lost like property or other property, and who were just as loyal as he was. You cannot repair these losses. Let it go forth, therefore, that we take the position distinctly and emphatically that this talk of paying southern war claims must end. Teach it to our people and teach it to all the people, and let all this political excitement on the subject end.

Mr. President, I am the humblest man in the democratic party. That party, after eighteen years of absence, I trust and believe, is about to return full-fledged to power. I think it will have possession of every department of this Government. It certainly will have it if we convince the people North and South that we deserve to have it; for evidently the people are well satisfied that the republican party does not deserve to be continued in power, and the only question with the people is whether the democratic party does deserve to be intrusted with power. If I had control of the party, as I have not, and shall never have, if my voice were worth anything, there are four things I would have the democratic party to proclaim to the world in most convincing terms and adhere to with unflinching fidelity. I would have the party to say:

1. We will not pay war losses, loyal or disloyal, unless we make a few exceptions of religious, educational, and charitable institutions, and very few of these.

2. We will vote no more of the public money and no more of the public credit, and no more of the public lands to build up or enrich mammoth monopolies in the shape of railroad corporations.

3. We will in good faith pay every dollar of the public debt, principal and interest, in good money of the standard value.

4. We will restore the Constitution to the country and honesty and economy to its administration, confining the General Government to its limited, delegated sovereign powers to promote the general welfare, and leaving the States unmolested in the exercise of their reserved sovereign powers to promote the local welfare of the people.

Do these four things, and, in my judgment, the child is not born who will witness the termination of democratic administration in this country, and the tongue has not been gifted with language that can express the prosperity which will follow to all our people in every section of our country.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] has traveled over a great deal of ground this morning, but I am unable to see its application to the case now before the Senate. It seems to me the inquiry of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was very appropriate. The Senator from Georgia has great difficulty in defining what is loyalty to the Government. It seems to me the Senator must have forgotten some of the early lessons of this country and some of the teachings of the patriots of the country. I can refer him to a definition which will tell him what loyalty is; it is one that is familiar in this country, and one which, if the Senator and his compeers had remembered when they attempted to destroy the Government, would have prevented that attempt:

> Our country! * * * may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong.

If the Senator has so much difficulty in defining what is loyalty, if that is the condition of the members of the party to which he belongs, it will be a sad day for this country when the people come to the conclusion, as he says they have, that the republican party should not be intrusted with the powers of this Government, but that it should be transferred to the party to which the Senator belongs.

Mr. President, this claim is a claim depending upon its own facts, and the Senate will not be misled in regard to it. The Senators on the other side of the Chamber do not at all agree with the Senator who has just taken his seat in believing that no war claims should be paid. There are Senators there who do believe that war claims should be paid, and there are those who believe that this claim should be paid, war claim or not. This claim must depend upon its own facts, and whatever may be Mr. Mitchell's character as a citizen, whatever may be his honesty, his integrity in regard to his private life and transactions, in his conduct during the war he rendered aid and service to the confederate government. In doing that he acquired this cotton which was seized by the general of the Union Army and confiscated and sold. Mr. Mitchell remained there during the whole war, and not only purchased and traded there, but, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREERY] himself says, engaged in supplying that army with provisions to maintain the confederate forces.

That is the condition in which he presents himself here claiming to be a loyal man, and, under the definition of the Senator from Georgia, he says he may be loyal or disloyal. I can come to but one conclusion from the facts in this case: that is, that he was disloyal during the war as is shown by all his acts and conduct during that time, whatever his professions may be now.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I had determined not to say a word on this subject, because I supposed other gentlemen would exhaust the subject, which is in a nutshell. I hope that at least one other Senator, [Mr. JONES, of Florida,] who was on the committee in the last Congress, will be heard; but I confess I am amazed at the stump speeches that have been made on this floor about national politics both by the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Minnesota, both of whom being on the same side and voting against this bill might, I think, have reserved their opinions on great national politics till they found some occasion where they differed, instead of making a private claim the occasion of so much gush. Warren Mitchell either has an equitable right to this money he asks for or he has not; and, while I know that there are many so-called loyal war claims that I will oppose as earnestly as the Senator from Georgia or anybody else, if any citizen of any State presents as fair a claim as Warren Mitchell seems to me to do, I will vote to pay it to him whether he was loyal or disloyal.

The facts in this case are few and simple. Warren Mitchell, a citizen of Kentucky, who whether the Federal authorities had power to give him the right to go South or not believed they had, and they believed so, went there by authority of the commanding officer at Louisville, Kentucky, and had in his possession at the close of the war, in Savannah, Georgia, as his private property, a large amount of cotton, which, together with other cotton, was seized by the authorities of the United States. Out of the proceeds of this cotton—after paying all expenses, commissions, and fees to those who acted as agents of the Treasury, and they took nearly half of it—a large amount, some $128,000, is now in the United States Treasury, deposited there as the proceeds of the cotton of Warren Mitchell, not, as the Senator from Georgia suggests, money that his poor people have been taxed to furnish. If recovery is had, it is not to be had out of money levied or collected by taxation from the people, but simply a fund in the Treasury of the United States, the proceeds of the sale of property that belonged to Mr. Warren Mitchell, now held in the Treasury of the United States subject to the rights of the owner, if there is any right in any owner, and it is for Congress to determine whether there is or not. It is admitted on all hands, admitted by the Senator from Minnesota, that if the property then seized by the United States authorities had been the property of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] or the property of Mr. Jefferson Davis, or of any other official from brigadier-general up or down in the confederate service, he would have recovered it and would have the money in his pocket to-day, and many of them have recovered it for property seized at the same time and taken under the same circumstances: men who were high officials, brigadier and major-generals in the army of the confederacy during all the war, have made their demands on the Treasury and claimed it and had it allowed to them.

Mr. VOORHEES. And they got it by a vote of both republicans and democrats.

Mr. BECK. Yes: and they got it by a vote of the republican and democratic parties both, and by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Now when an honest man who took no part in the war—to state his case in the worst aspect of it, did nothing except that he was inside their lines trying to collect the debts justly due him, and labored with his hands to make a living in order to keep from starvation, when there was nothing else to do—comes to demand his money, he cannot get it, and great indignation is raised by men who fought all through the war, as the Senator from Georgia I suppose did; when he and all the men who fought with him have received their money, Mr. Mitchell cannot get his, and they say it is an outrage for him to ask for it.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me?

Mr. BECK. I do not know whether the Senator from Georgia got any money out of the Treasury.

Mr. HILL. I never asked the Government to pay me anything, and I do not know anybody in the South in my condition who ever did ask it.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Georgia has only to read the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Padelford, in the case of Pargoud, in the case of Armstrong, in the case of Klein, and in dozens of other cases, to find that millions of dollars have been paid to men in the South under circumstances exactly like those which surrounded him whose cotton was taken by the Federal authorities. The decisions of the Supreme Court in 9 Wallace, in 13 Wallace, and 21 Wallace, in 1 Otto, and in dozens of other cases—indeed, the reports are full of just such cases as those to which I allude, where the money was paid to confederate generals and high officials for cotton taken just as Mr. Mitchell's was. Let me read the reply of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN] when the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] asked him a question.

Mr. HILL. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Kentucky, but I will state to him that I have not recently looked at the cases he refers to. My recollection, however, is that in the cases he refers to the decisions of the Supreme Court were put on the ground that the claimants were pardoned before their property was seized.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. So was Mr. Mitchell pardoned.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; he too has a pardon, which wipes out his offenses.

Mr. HILL. Before his cotton was seized? Did Mr. Mitchell get an amnesty before his cotton was condemned as contraband of war?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That could not well be.

Mr. BECK. The decision of the court was that the pardon of any one pardoned related back in all cases.

Mr. HILL. They did not state it justifiably, but they stated the exact fact and put it on that peculiar ground.

Mr. BECK. The fact is as I have stated it.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] put a question to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN] when the bill was before the Senate last Thursday. Said Senator HARRIS:

> Where is the legal title to that cotton or to the proceeds?
> Mr. McMILLAN. It is not in Warren Mitchell.
> Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator be kind enough to tell me where it is?
> Mr. McMILLAN. The Government of the United States has seized that property as a prize of war. Mr. Mitchell not only has no title to it technically, but he has no title to it under any view of the case you can take.
> Mr. BOOTH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for my own enlightenment?
> Mr. McMILLAN. Certainly.
> Mr. BOOTH. Would this cotton have been liable to seizure and confiscation if it still remained in the hands of Mitchell's vendors?
> Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir; because his vendors were engaged in supporting the rebellion; they were citizens of the confederacy. That is the difference between his vendors and himself. They were doing acts which we recognized as being proper on their part to their own government.

That admits the whole case. Can the equity of an active confederate be greater than that of a private citizen of an adhering State?

The Senator from Minnesota stands up here and tells us that every one of those men who fought in the confederacy was doing acts proper to their own government, and therefore would under these circumstances be entitled to the proceeds of his property, and ought to have it, as the Supreme Court said they ought, and then he raises the cry that fraud is being perpetrated when a man like Warren Mitchell, seventy-odd years of age, who spent his fortune in paying the men he owed in Louisville and Cincinnati, many of whom were loyal and fought through the war on the Federal side, asks the same rights Mr. Davis would, as he admits, be entitled to. It is a horrible outrage, says the Senator, for him to come and ask it. He was in the possession of that property. All the decisions of the Supreme Court in the case of Klein and others show that seizure by the military does not divest the title of the man from whom it is seized; it does not work confiscation of the property; but it is held by the United States as a trustee for the man who is the owner of it. Klein having shown that he was the owner, they gave it to him. The Supreme Court said that seizures only reach to captures on the high seas, to abandoned property, the property of belligerent enemies used for the purpose of war, and that the property of a private citizen did not belong to the Government by reason of the Government taking it into its possession.

Warren Mitchell had that cotton in his possession. It was taken from him by a wrong-doer, as the court say. The Government had no right to take it. Although its proceeds are in the Treasury, they are there to his credit. The money never reached the Treasury by the taxation of a human being. No person ever paid a dollar of taxes to place that money there. The Government holds it, I repeat, as a trustee. The United States can only keep it from him by reason of the trespass committed on him; and no matter what his title is, it is a better title than the title of any trespasser. Even if there was illegality or wrong in the original contract and he had no right to buy cotton from the people of the South, yet, having bought it and having it in his possession, that possession gives him a better title than anybody else who has no title except that acquired by wrongful seizure. Although the courts may hold that the contract was illegal, yet the law will never interfere to take it away from him and vest title in a trespasser. To illustrate: I have a copy of the Revised Statutes of the United States in my hand. I claim it as mine. Does the Senator from Minnesota think that he could take that book out of my hand and claim it as his and deposit it in a court or in the Treasury or anywhere else and then with any plausibility argue the question that I have not a title to the book, that I got it wrongfully from Mr. HILL? It is none of his business where I got it. My title is better than his; he has no right to inquire into my title, and had no right to deprive me of my possessory title.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. I ask the Senator to wait until I get through with my illustration and then I will answer any question that is pertinent. I repeat, I am in possession of the book. I am claiming it as mine. The Senator from Minnesota takes it, and it is proven that he has no right to it; that he had no right to take it. When I ask to have it restored he has no right even to raise the question of how I got it. My possession protected me. When Warren Mitchell had that cotton the United States acquired no title by the seizure; and when the money is in the Treasury, as it is now, subject to the right of the owner, the United States has no right to raise the question as to how he got it or with whom he traded or whether he was loyal or disloyal. We had no right, even while at war, to go and take the property, the beds, th e moneys, the tables, or the dishes of the people of Savannah because the Federal forces captured that city. Here are the terms on which civilized war is carried on, and every man in the Senate and all except two in the House voted for the following resolution, when Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, moved it, on the 22d of July, 1861:

Resolved, &c., That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the Southern States now in revolt against the constitutional government and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States; but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease.

That was the spirit in which we professed to be carrying on the war. Here was a citizen of the United States, not a belligerent, with property belonging to him. The Government took his property. The Supreme Court decided that they had no right to take it, but decided that there was no law authorizing him to sue the United States. If it had been taken from Mr. Davis, or Mr. STEPHENS, or Mr. HILL, or any of the gentlemen from the South whom I see around me now, they could have sued and recovered it back, as many similarly situated did; and yet this Congress is to be told that when Mr. Mitchell had been deprived of property rightfully in his possession, which was wrongfully taken from him, which any confederate could have recovered, the United States has a good title to it, and that it is a fraud and an outrage to say that he ought to come to the Congress of the United States and ask the representatives of the people to put him in the same position in which Mr. Davis or Mr. HILL or any one else of the leading confederates has been placed.

It is said that in the country from which I and my ancestors came a celebrated man by the name of "Rob Roy" laid down the law to be—

> That they should take who have the power,
> And they should keep who can.

That is the law of the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Georgia, and all those who are maintaining that this money should be retained in the Treasury. You have got it; you have the power to hold it; it never was yours; it was taken wrongfully, but you are going to apply to the payment of taxes what never was derived by taxation from the people, an honest man's money that could not have been held by you if he had been engaged in red-handed rebellion, as many of you choose to call it; and not only that, but you rise and deliver tirades of abuse against the reputation of a peaceable citizen admitted to be honest, and to show how patriotic you are hold up your hands and say, "oh no! equity ought to close its doors against such a claim as this; no man can deny that the decisions of the Supreme Court are in our favor; on all the principles of justice and equity the right is in our favor, and the possession was unquestionably ours; that is all any legislator can properly inquire into." Mr. Mitchell was wrongfully deprived of it; the money is held, as it were, in chancery, to be interpleaded for, and who has a better title? If you can keep Mitchell's money, then you could have taken all the money, all the beds, all the clothing, and everything that the people in Savannah had in spite of the resolution I have read, which was passed when the war began, that we were fighting only to restore peace and proposed to fight only with the armies in the field.

The Supreme Court, if you would give it jurisdiction, would unanimously sustain this claim; the facts are with us; the equity of the case is in favor of Mr. Mitchell, and as he was a citizen of my State I could not sit by, although I had not intended to say a word, when I heard such abuse heaped upon him all around and his claim sneered at in the way it was, without stating the facts as the record shows them to be.

I am asked a question by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON:] what does the Supreme Court say about the case? In 21 Wallace, which I hold in my hand, which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] will, I hope, look at, the decision is simply that being a citizen of the State of Kentucky and not a citizen of one of the Confederate States he could not sue in that court; his domicile being in a loyal State, and the cotton being obtained by him and seized in another State, and having had business transactions there he had no standing in court. Not one word is said in that case against the merit of his claim. On the contrary, the court admits that if he had been a citizen of a disloyal State, if he had been in fact himself the commander-in-chief of the armies of the confederacy, residing in Georgia, the Government would have been compelled to pay him the money. There is nothing against him in the decision in 21 Wallace except the single fact of his residence.

This Congress cannot in my judgment afford to stand and resist his claim on that ground. I know that there are men who want the Treasury to take everything. There are gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol and here also I expect who want us to take England's money received from the Geneva award and place it in the Treasury, to take all we can, and hold all we can get. I would rather sink Warren Mitchell's money and all the money obtained at Geneva in the bottom of the ocean than disgrace the United States by holding money thus obtained and thus wrongfully held in the Treasury of the United States, when the Government would have paid it out to any of the confederate generals or to the president of the southern confederacy and yet holds it because the claimant was a citizen of a loyal State himself, an honest and a loyal man, and therefore he had not a status in the courts. It is guilty of a most disgraceful act if it does. This Congress would say by the rejection of this claim, "We will keep the money because we have got it, and you have not the power to take it away from us."

If it was not Warren Mitchell's cotton, it was the cotton of the man from whom he bought it. Suppose he had bought it from Mr. HILL. Mr. HILL could have gone into the courts and recovered it all. Suppose he had bought it from Mr. Davis or Mr. STEPHENS, or any of the high functionaries of the confederacy, they could have said that Mr. Mitchell did not vest himself with the title because the transaction was illegal, and they could have shown that fact and recovered it and have the money in their pockets now. That would be just and equitable, I suppose, even if Mr. Mitchell had paid them for it. But this Congress is asked to say, because it was taken wrongfully from a citizen of Kentucky, while it could not have been taken wrongfully from any of those high confederates, you will not give him a hearing, and will drive him forth in disgrace and poverty because you can make pretense that he is not a loyal claimant.

I am as much opposed to those so-called loyal claims as anybody here. I agree with the Senator from Georgia in that, at least; but I am not going to vote for this claim because this claimant was loyal or disloyal; that question is not worthy of consideration. I will vote for it because it is his, and not ours. There are high officers of the Federal Government who are now habitually making affidavits as to the loyalty of men whom they themselves imprisoned for disloyalty, because they can now share the profits of their claims; but Mitchell's is not a case of that sort. He is here representing himself, and telling the truth. Those men in the South owed him. He obtained the cotton, and it was wrongfully taken from him. He has paid $150,000 of debts to men in Louisville and Cincinnati, indeed all over the country, and he is almost a bankrupt at seventy years of age, and the Treasury is holding the money that he tried so hard to get to indemnify him, and honorable Senators propose to keep it. Yet nothing is proved against him except that, in order to make a living during the time he had to stay there, as he had to do some sort of work or starve, he did work that inured perhaps to the benefit of the Confederate States, when there was nothing else in the country that he could do. That is the whole case. You can vote it down if you desire; it will not be a record the men who do so will be proud of.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I intimated before this case was taken up for consideration that I intended to cast my vote against this bill; I expected to do so silently and without argumentation, standing upon the facts and upon the doctrine stated in the report of the majority of the committee. I still adhere to my opinions. I have not felt myself dislodged from those convictions by any remarks that have fallen from any Senator on this floor either in reference to the question of justice or of the injustice on the part of the United States, or in reference to any supposed influence that such a vote may have on the status or future prospects of political parties. So far as Mr. Mitchell personally is concerned I have for him great respect, and I may add that the people of Alabama have also for him great respect, having for a series of years enjoyed commercial intercourse with him, and having received from him favors of which we are not forgetful.

I suppose that no case will ever come before the Senate in which I shall follow the convictions of my own mind with more reluctance than I shall in this case, for I not only prize the character of this gentleman, but I sympathize with and commiserate his misfortunes. But, sir, this is a question that ought to be considered by the Senate of the United States with reference to principle. It is not a question whether Mr. Mitchell is seventy years old, and infirm, and poor, but the question is whether or not we shall commit ourselves to a certain doctrine which overturns the judicial decisions of the highest tribunal of the United States. Upon all questions that come within the range of the jurisdiction of that august body, it is a fixed principle, I may say, with me, to follow its decisions so long as they are consistent at all with common sense and with my views of the Constitution, and upon all debatable propositions I yield my judgment to that of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Government of the United States, after the war had ceased, made what I conceive to be a liberal and generous provision of law, by which persons who felt themselves aggrieved by seizures made during the war might come into a court constituted by Congress for the purpose of presenting their claims to the consideration of that court, giving also a right of appeal to the defeated party, whether the United States or the plaintiff in the action, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and fixing the right of claimants to the indemnity upon the same basis that the rights of individuals were before fixed in litigations between each other. After having provided a court of that sort, after having provided an appeal from that court to the Supreme Court of the United States, the question is whether Congress ought to fly in the face of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and in a fit of generosity, which may be excited either by political affiliation or by sympathy for the personal misfortunes of any man, undertake to overturn that decision, go counter to it, and vote an appropriation of money in favor of an individual who the Supreme Court has decided is not entitled to any compensation whatever.

Although when Mr. Mitchell came to Alabama he may have come for the purpose of collecting debts, in order that out of the proceeds of those collections he might pay debts that he owed to northern creditors, he came really in violation of the laws of the country. It was found to be necessary in the late war, as it has been found to be necessary in all wars, that rules of non-intercourse should be established either by congressional action or by presidential proclamation, the President being the chief commander of the Army and Navy, which should prohibit the citizens of the different belligerent localities from carrying on a commercial intercourse with each other. Mr. Mitchell came to the Southern States in violation of these rules of non-intercourse, and, while thus violating a law of the United States essential for the prosecution of the war itself, he acquired or supposed that he had acquired a title to certain property in the South, cotton, which I must say he acquired in part by purchase and in part by speculation. At all events he acquired that which was considered in the States that he visited a title as against all other individuals to this particular cotton. He concentrated it at the port of Savannah, with a view to its speedy shipment after the war might close to some port for sale. During the war, while belligerent hostilities were prevailing, while the war was flagrant in the country, General Sherman, in an attack that he made on the city of Savannah, captured this property along with a great deal of other property in that city. General Sherman, if the rules of war that prevailed between civilized countries had been afterward carried into execution between the United States and the Confederate States, might have transferred every dollar of the property that he captured in Savannah to the United States Treasury, and no man in the South under the public laws of war between separate and distinct nations could have claimed that he had an individual right or any right whatsoever to the cotton thus captured or its proceeds.

But the Government of the United States afterward made an exception in favor of those men whose private property had been taken, and gave to those men who could prove their title to their private property the right to go into the Court of Claims and there assert that right as against the Government, and to pursue that right so as to reclaim from the Government the amount of money which was the proceeds of cotton that might actually have found its way into the Treasury of the United States. This was an act of grace on the part of the Government. It was an act that the Government of the United States were not under public law compelled to do; and I will not be found on the floor of the Senate flying in the face of a law which I consider at once liberal and generous and, I must say also, just.

Mr. Warren Mitchell, availing himself of this law, went into the courts of the United States; he preferred his claim there, in what capacity? As the owner of these bales of cotton. He could not have come as a suitor against the Government of the United States in any other capacity than that of the owner of these bales of cotton. The question that the Government of the United States permitted him to argue in its tribunals was not one of naked equity; it was not one purely of conscience; but it was a question of legal right; and when he came to the threshold of that court and presented his demand he had to come with a legal right or else he came with no right at all.

When Warren Mitchell went into the Court of Claims, as I insist he went there, for the purpose of having the question decided by that tribunal whether he was the owner of this cotton, it was decided adversely to him by a divided court. That case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and upon full consideration of all the evidence that he was able to produce in affirmance of his title, it was decided that he was not the owner of this cotton. Now, then, we can ask for no higher adjudication, no more solemn judgment on the claim of Warren Mitchell than that which has been pronounced by the Supreme Court of the United States which excludes him from the ownership of this cotton because of his having violated the laws of the United States in obtaining possession of it in the Confederate States. The proposition is that whereas he was a citizen of the State of Kentucky, domiciled therein, and had no right to go into the enemy country for the purpose of traffic with the citizens of that country without the permission of a certain authority of the Government, he had not obtained that authority, he went contrary to law, and in every act that he performed while in the State of Alabama he violated the laws of the United States.

Now, sir, it makes no difference how strongly my sympathies might move me in the direction of recompensing the losses he may have met, I cannot find that it is my duty as a Senator, or indeed my right as a Senator, to give him out of the Treasury of the United States money arising from the proceeds of the sale of property which did not belong to him. The question is asked here "to whom did it belong?" If you will consult the act of Congress in reference to captured and abandoned property, you will see at once to whom it belonged, because the Government of the United States took jurisdiction of the disposal of all property left in the precise condition that this was and converted it into property, the proceeds of which should be paid into the Treasury of the United States. When the money thus realized got there, it got there legitimately for all public purposes, and it is not for us now to discuss whether Warren Mitchell might have from conscientious or moral duress obtained the title of the vendors of the cotton or some of them. The laws of the country have said the proceeds of this cotton have rightfully gone into the Treasury of the United States. If we take them out and pay them to Warren Mitchell, we pay them contrary to those laws.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama whether if upon all the facts presented by this case the claimant, instead of being a loyal citizen residing in the State of Kentucky, had been a disloyal citizen residing in the State of Alabama, he would vote to pay this claim under his views of public law and the decisions of the Supreme Court?

Mr. MORGAN. If I had been on the Court of Claims, and the case had come there for judicial decision, not barred by the statute of limitations, I think it is very likely I would have decided that he was entitled to the cotton, if he had been pardoned and was also a citizen of Alabama, because his title to the property in that instance would not have been acquired by a violation of the laws of the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I understand the Senator from Alabama to hold and to declare to the Senate and the country that if he had been a member of the Court of Claims or a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, and this case had come before either of those courts of which he might have been a member, upon precisely the same facts as are presented by this case, with the exception that the claimant had been a rebel and a resident of a disloyal State, he would have voted to pay the claim under his views of public law.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know whether the Senator from Oregon has ever been president of a Sunday-school or not; but he certainly is a master of catechism.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have put a very simple question.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not propose to answer every question that may arise in the mind of the Senator from Oregon. It is sufficient for me to answer those questions which arise on the record of the case. I will say to him, however, that if I had had the good fortune to have been on the Court of Claims, or even the Supreme Court of the United States, and a man who had been pardoned, though he had been a rebel, had found his cotton taken without authority of law and converted into the Treasury of the United States, I should have been compelled, under the laws of the United States, to vote to give him the proceeds of that cotton unless in the acquisition of the title to that property he had violated some law of the United States, which a rebel would not have done.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, if I do not interrupt the Senator, the only reason, as I understand him, why the Senator would not as a member of either of those courts or as a member of Congress vote to pay this claim is because the claimant at the time the transaction occurred was a loyal man, a citizen of a loyal State, and was not a disloyal man and a citizen of a disloyal State.

Mr. MORGAN. The reason in that case would have been that the man who was thus situated would not have violated the laws of the United States in an endeavor to acquire a title to this property. If the Senator cannot understand that distinction, he will excuse me from undertaking to educate him on this subject.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am willing to receive all the light my friend from Alabama can give me on the subject. I do not profess to be as wise as my friend from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. The reason why he was not entitled to the ownership of this cotton is that a law of the United States had prohibited him, being a citizen of Kentucky, from going down South and trafficking with our people for the acquisition of the property. That legal infirmity was in his title, which he could not overcome, and from which to-day we have no right to excuse him. That dispenses with all inquiry really in reference to his loyalty or disloyalty. Mr. Mitchell stands here to-day as a man against whom it has been decided by the Supreme Court that he is making claim to money the result of sales of cotton which did not belong to him under the laws of the country. Therefore his appeal comes to us in the nature of a petition for a charity, a benefaction to be conferred by Congress. When he comes upon that ground I have great personal sympathy for him, and, as I have remarked, I have great respect for him. At the same time I do not suppose that his loyalty is of that supreme and immaculate character that would justify us in taking $110,000 out of the Treasury for the mere purpose of rewarding that sentiment of his mind, which I must say was not very fully portrayed in the actions and conduct of his life during the period of the rebellion.

I do not profess to be a perfect judge of that description and quality of loyalty which entitles a man to come to the Congress of the United States and demand some recompense at our hands as a reward for that loyalty under which he asserts no positive legal title. On that subject I am disposed to defer to those gentlemen who have better ideas and views of what constituted loyalty to the Government of the United States than I have been able to form or than I possess. I can only say this: if the Confederate States had succeeded in their effort at emancipation from the Union and had succeeded in the establishment of an independent government, and this cotton had been destroyed by the same means or taken by the same means that the cotton was taken by the capture of Savannah, I never should have found it in my heart as one of the confederate soldiers or confederate lawmakers to have denied Mr. Mitchell compensation upon the ground of his disloyalty to the confederacy, for, though gentlemen may think he was entirely loyal to the Union, I believe that he was as loyal to the confederacy as a man could be whose home was in a non-belligerent or rather in a loyal State. I mean by that loyalty evinced by sympathy and sentiment, and I might add loyalty as evinced by conduct while he was within our lines during the whole period of the war and which enabled him to participate in the benefit of contracts for furnishing supplies to the confederate army.

When we propose to reward loyalty I want to reward the pure article. I do not want to reward any article of loyalty that seems to be in the least degree under suspicion; and I am determined in my conduct in the Senate, when men come from the South, or from the North either, claiming the rewards of their loyalty, that they shall prove it to a demonstration before I will undertake to reward them on that account. I am not satisfied on that subject here, and yet I have rendered my judgment as a member of the committee and as a Senator upon the ground that we have to undo a decision of the Supreme Court, we have virtually to repeal the laws of the United States, before we can ever get at this money in the Treasury for the purpose of returning it to Warren Mitchell.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I do it now as I suppose there are other Senators who wish to speak on this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator withdraw that motion for a few moments?

Mr. HAMLIN. How long?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Ten minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Others desire to speak on the question. I hope the Senator will postpone his remarks until another day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) It is moved by the Senator from Maine that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 21.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If this bill can be left as the unfinished business for to-morrow, very well; I have no particular desire to go on this evening.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Florida does not claim the floor to speak now, I should like to make a motion. I move to postpone the present and all prior orders and take up the resolutions that I offered the other day on the subject of the constitutional amendments and instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to report a certain bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I cannot yield to that.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator from Florida prefer to proceed to-day rather than to-morrow if this bill goes over as unfinished business?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I would rather speak to-morrow if the bill goes over as the unfinished business; but if it is to lose its place on the Calendar, I prefer to go on now.

Mr. CONKLING. So I apprehend; and yet I think Senators around the Senator from Florida voted against the motion to proceed to executive business supposing that he preferred to speak to-night. If he does not prefer to speak to-night, then I venture to renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That will leave this bill as the unfinished business for to-morrow, and the Senator from Florida will be entitled to the floor. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to inquire, if the Senate proceeds now to the consideration of executive business, does it leave this bill as the unfinished business?

Mr. CONKLING and others. Certainly it does.

Mr. HARRIS. That was my impression, but I desired to know it certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my motion should not prevail now to take up the resolutions I have had the honor to propose, I shall try to move them to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. I of course understand that if the motion of the Senator from Vermont shall be carried by the Senate it postpones the consideration of the bill; but the motion of the Senator from New York to proceed to the consideration of executive business, as I understand, leaves this bill as the unfinished business and the business in order for to-morrow?

Mr. CONKLING. No doubt about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from New York that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENTAL AID TO ACTUAL SETTLERS.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] (coming over as unfinished business from Monday, December 18) to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House bill No. 110 and to pass that bill. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill supplemental to an act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act any person who is entitled to and shall comply with the provisions of the act to which this is supplemental, as well as all the requirements imposed by this act, shall receive from the Treasury of the United States, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500 in a loan, to be repaid as hereinafter provided; which money so loaned shall be appropriated solely, by the person who shall receive the same, in improvements upon the land entered and settled upon, under the terms and conditions imposed by the said homestead law, including the erection of buildings, the purchase of seeds, implements of husbandry, and such necessary household articles and means of subsistence as may be necessary in the commencement of a permanent farming residence.

SEC. 2. Every person having thus complied shall, in addition, produce to the register or receiver of the land office of the United States convenient to the homestead selected satisfactory proof to the said register or receiver, by affidavit or otherwise, that he or she does not own goods or effects, money or other property, in excess of $300; that it is his or her intention bonafidely to settle upon and occupy the land entered and selected under the provisions of the said homestead law, and to make the same a permanent abode; that such person shall also make and subscribe an affidavit before the said register or receiver that the money so received under the provisions of this act shall be expended for no other purpose than that named in the first section of this act, which affidavit and all other evidence shall be filed and preserved in the land office of the United States where the proceedings are had.

SEC. 3. Whereupon the said register or receiver shall cause to be prepared a mortgage to the United States, to be duly executed by the applicant, conveying the land so selected and entered, and which he or she contemplates settling upon, conditioned for the payment of $500, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, as follows: $100, with interest thereon, on the fifth year after the date of the mortgage, and $100, with its interest, yearly thereafter, till the whole sum shall be fully paid, when the said mortgage shall be satisfied by the said register or receiver, or by such person as may be designated for that purpose by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. A copy of each mortgage made in pursuance of this act shall, after the original has been duly recorded in the proper office for the recording of deeds most convenient to the land described therein, under the certificate and seal of the register of the land office where executed, be forwarded to the General Land Office at Washington, the original to be retained in the land office where executed. The said registers shall keep a journal of all loans, the names of the persons making them, their places of birth, and their respective ages. The said certified copies are hereby declared to be evidence on the part of the United States, and suits for foreclosure may be instituted upon them as effectually as upon the originals. The said several registers and receivers shall make monthly reports to the General Land Office of the United States of all acts done by them in the premises.

SEC. 4. Upon a full compliance of the terms and conditions hereinbefore stated, as well as those of the law to which this act is supplemental, by the person availing himself or herself of the benefits thereof, the receiver of the land office where the proceedings have taken place shall pay him or her $100, and $100 monthly thereafter till the said sum of $500 shall have been fully disbursed. But before the payment of any one installment of $100 subsequent to the first one, the said receiver shall be satisfied by other testimony than the oath of the applicant that he or she has expended the money loaned, and will expend the money received, in accordance with the true intent and meaning of this act. And if it shall appear that any money has not been so expended, no further payment in the particular case shall be made, and the mortgage given shall be forthwith foreclosed, and all rights and privileges under this act, and the one to which it is supplemental, shall become forfeited, and the title to the land entered shall revert to the United States. The several duties to be performed by the register and the receiver shall be generally under the direction and control of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and who shall also fix a schedule of fees for each officer, in each separate case, but which shall not exceed $10 for them both. And the said Commissioner of the General Land Office, in conjunction with the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make and establish such rules and regulations as to the mode and manner of the transmission and payment of the money appropriated by this act as they may deem proper.

SEC. 5. No patent shall be issued under the act of May 20, 1862, and to which this act is supplemental, where a mortgage has been given under the terms of this act, until such mortgage has been fully paid.

SEC. 6. All such parts and clauses of the said act of May 20, 1862, which prohibits persons from the benefits of the same, "who have borne arms against the United States Government, or given aid and comfort to its enemies," are hereby repealed.

SEC. 7. Whenever the amount of the loan hereby created shall have reached the sum of $10,000,000 this act shall cease and determine, so far as the appropriation of money is concerned. And the certificate of the Secretary of the Treasury, that that sum has been applied as herein stated, shall be evidence of the same.

SEC. 8. All the several penalties imposed in the act to which this is supplemental for false swearing, and other offenses therein named, are herein incorporated and made a part of this act.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the indulgence of the House that I may explain briefly the provisions of this bill.

The SPEAKER. What time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. WRIGHT. Thirty minutes. I hope this favor will be granted. I have not asked such a favor before.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks consent that he may be allowed thirty minutes to explain the provisions of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is appealed to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The appeal is denied.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York denies the appeal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WRIGHT. Well, I hope the Lord may take care of the man who objects, for his constituents never will. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can accomplish his object by moving to suspend the rules so as to give him half an hour to explain the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. Very well, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, as the Chair understands, modifies his motion; but if this motion be voted down, the Chair cannot recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania a second time. The present motion of the gentleman, as the Chair understands, is to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of this bill, and to bring it before the House for consideration for thirty minutes.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Chamber for their courtesy in granting me its unanimous consent, with a single exception, to make a few remarks explanatory of the bill under consideration. It provides for making a small loan to any citizen of the United States who does not possess property, either real or personal, exceeding $300 in value. It is not in the nature of a gift; it is a loan, to be secured by a mortgage upon his homestead, to be repaid at the expiration of ten years, in annual installments, at 3 per cent. per annum. This sum is to be advanced by the Government, providing that it must be made to appear by satisfactory proof that each installment has been faithfully expended in the improvement of the homestead before the next installment will be paid, each installment being $100; the loan thus made to be secured by mortgage on the homestead.

The bill is carefully guarded against all efforts of the settler to obtain the money and then abandon his location. The little farm must show how the expenditure of money on the part of the settler has been appropriated. The same penalties, so far as applicable, contained in the homestead law of 1862 are made part of the bill. I have bestowed much care in drafting the bill so that the Government may be protected from imposition and fraud. Its whole object and aim are to furnish those of our people having small means to make the homestead law available; and, while the ten millions which the bill appropriates may not provide for a very large number of our poor laboring people, the passage of the bill into a law will become a precedent for its further extension. Keeping in view that this project of law is a loan and not a gift, it may meet the objection of those who may have conscientious scruples in giving it their support, for there are many members of this body who would favor this measure but for constitutional objections. I prefer this method of affording present aid to our laboring people of small means to the system of colonization, for the reason that there is less machinery in carrying out the details of the bill before us and much less expense. It is provided that $10 in each case shall cover all the expenses, and this amount shall be paid by the settlers. In this method the whole sum granted will be relieved from salaries and other large outlays that will be necessarily incident to the system of colonization.

I have thus, Mr. Speaker, in as few words as practicable, defined the nature and character of the bill. Having done this, let me next inquire as to the propriety of administering this kind of relief. I will not discuss the question as to its necessity. That ought to be self-evident to all, including the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who alone, of all the members of this honorable body, denied me the poor privilege of speaking in behalf of the laboring-men of the nation. But to come down to the question of the propriety of Congress stepping out of the path of class legislation and looking to the happiness and comfort of that other class who fight our battles, help to pay our taxes, erect our public works, build our railroads and canals, and give our country fame and renown, what shall we say to these momentous matters? That seems to me to be a very important inquiry. It may strike others differently, but it does not me. I am one of those, sir, who believe in the philanthropic idea that our first duty here is to take care of the toiling men of the land, and capital next; labor, sir, first, and capital next; or you may class them equally. To this I will not take exception; but I will never while I am the Representative of the twelfth congressional district of Pennsylvania submit to the idea that there is any other class in this broad land which shall subordinate the rights and privileges of the laboring-man. Such may claim equality, but not preference. To one common standard let them all approach, but no superiority should be conferred by money or social position. This is my idea. And who here or elsewhere has the temerity to controvert the position?

But, sir, as to the propriety of this measure of relief. We all know the depression of the business affairs of the country; we know that the black cloud of adversity has been suspended over us for the last five years; we know that the mines and the mills and the manufactories are all at the lowest and most depressed financial situation. This will not be denied. And such being the situation, vast numbers of laboring-men who have had employment are of necessity thrown out of their occupations. The employés of these branches of trade and industries, once prosperous and with the ability to supply themselves and their families with the necessary wants of life, and some of its luxuries, are now in destitution. It is said, and upon what I accept as good authority, that there are two millions of workingmen in our country who to-day are in idleness because they cannot get employment. It is no fault of theirs that many of them are wandering about our streets asking for alms. It is a wonder to me, Mr. Speaker, that they have become reconciled to this humiliating position and still comply with the laws of the country. Want and starvation, in many cases, have become their daily companions. Go with me to the iron-mills in Pennsylvania, where in the days of prosperity strong men were about the forge, the furnace, the great hammers beating and crushing red-hot blooms, and other machinery rolling them into rails for your thousand miles of roads; when mirth and contentment filled the red-glowing chambers, and when the wolf dare not approach the humble but well-supplied tenements of the bold, defiant, and stalwart owners. Or to the mines, where all was industry, happiness, and contentment. How now? You shall see idle, half-clad men, with faces of despondency depicted on them—not crime—standing in groups at the entrances of the mill and the mine and the machine-shop, waiting in the vain hope of procuring employment. And there they are, by day and by night. God help them! When will they have employment? When will they have aid from the Government, whose children they are, by birth or adoption?

When? Why, sir, when the greedy maw of capital shall have drained the Treasury of its last farthing, the men of the country may have the wrappers that contained the bundles of legal-tenders, with which they may patch the broken panes of their chill, desolate, and inhospitable tenements.

"Tramps!" Who heard this name applied to a distinctive class in this country till within the last five years? Who are "tramps?" The great majority of them have been men of good habits, industrious, kind to their children, and willing to labor, if they but had the chance and the opportunity to procure employment. Having failed in this, and endured privation till it could no longer be endured, they have turned their backs upon their cheerless and desolate homes and wandered away in the hope of finding some one to give them an opportunity to labor. Failing in every effort, they have wandered on till crime became necessary to save life. They committed it, and have been hastened to the prison and the mad-house. Mr. Speaker, you or I would have done the same thing, before we would submit to death by starvation. "Tramps," therefore, have become a class in the land. Wandering mendicants, going from door to door begging for alms, when they would willingly labor if they had the opportunity, and reduced to that sordid, squalid condition which poverty alone can impose. It is our duty to protect and take care of our people. Humanity demands it. It is the moral as well as positive law of our civilization.

We have always had, as a nation, the reputation of liberality. We sent our ships ladened with corn to Greece and Ireland in the day of famine. We would do so again if the same state of things should exist in any other country where civilization asserted its dominion. The English Queen and Empress of India furnishes free transportation to all her subjects who cannot find employment at home, and who desire to emigrate to her provinces. Cannot we do as much for the laboring citizen as she does for the laboring subject? Shall it be said, in answer, that the same cause does not exist on this side of the sea? It is not so. There is an immense amount of suffering in this country. But when one dares proclaim it boldly, capital puts it in the mouth of some one of its satellites to bawl "demagogue and lunatic." What are they paid for the effort?

This House cannot be insensible to the wretched condition of the great portion of our laboring class. Those members who live in rural districts—far removed from the mills, the mines, the manufactories, and the thickly settled cities, may not be so sensible of it. In the absence of this knowledge they should turn their eye upon the thousands of petitions which lie upon our table for information. I have myself presented more than fifty thousand names. Men praying for aid—humbly. But who has taken the time to read the humble prayer that has come up to us, by more than a hundred thousand of our people? Gilded capital demands and has a hearing. And gilded capital does this with freedom and impunity. No man who advocates class, and votes millions to it, is called "demagogue or lunatic." Oh, no! The press is silent; but let the cause of the poor be made in public halls—and this, in their consideration, is the voice of the madman.

I state here to-day that there is want and destitution. You do know it; and knowing it, there is a moral and legal duty to help alleviate it—not by building penitentiaries and mad-houses, but by enabling this countless multitude to settle down upon God's great farm, thereby becoming thrifty men and surrounded by happy families. It contains more than fifteen hundred millions of acres. True, the best part of it has been granted away to railroads, corporations, and credit mobiliers as a free gift. There is much of it left. Instead of giving to the poor man some money to build his cabin in the wilderness and procure some seeds to plant and implements to cultivate the soil with, loan him a few dollars on the security of his homestead. Give your millions of dollars of money and your millions of acres of land to capital, but lend, pray lend, on ample security, a few dollars to the men in want, but upon whose broad shoulders and strong arms rest the destiny as well as prosperity of the country. A loan, a very small loan, that is all. Your rich gifts and largesses, let them go elsewhere if you will; if this must be. Concede to me, as you must, that there is an alarming state of distress and suffering in the country, does not relief become an absolute duty? Suppose that some terrible disease should overshadow the country, and men, women, and children were its victims in great numbers, would you hesitate about granting immediate relief? Do you not believe that there is quite as great a calamity now? Do not shut your eyes to it. It is so; and not only here but throughout a great part of Europe. England stands to-day on the crest of a volcano. Strikes and bread riots are things of daily occurrence; labor two shillings a day and beef two shillings a pound. Germany has become restive, and the people are only kept in order by the largest standing army in time of peace that Europe ever saw. Distress and gloom are there as well as here. Will not our legislators look at the case as it is, and not as capital would represent it? Something, you all say, should be done—pray do it. You have the power, but lack the inclination. The time will come, and in this House, too, when there will be an influence that will neither shake nor tremble before the power of money and incorporated power. By this I mean a result from a fair and honest expression of political opinion at the polls. Call me no communist—I despise the word! And I equally denounce the idea of agrarianism. They are alike to me offensive. I want equal and just laws. Class has no rights in this House that laboring men have not. Capital and poverty should stand on the same level.

To grant relief to the laboring masses I would do many things not agreeable to me. I have never voted subsidies nor grants of land in the many years of my legislative life. I would to-day vote subsidies to the Texas Pacific road. I would do so in the hope of putting the iron-mills of my own State in motion, thereby furnishing employment to idle men—idle because they have no demand for their labor. I would vote the subsidy for the purpose of employing idle men in the construction of the road, and who, having completed their labor, might find homes in a new and unoccupied country.

I would vote liberal appropriations for making the navigation of the Mississippi thorough and complete, although I would not justify my vote, under the idea expressed by Mr. Calhoun, that "it is an inland sea," and therefore comes within the constitutional power of Congress. These are reasons which, in my judgment, would justify me in allowing subsidies on the part of the Government. One of the first duties demanding our attention is to care for the general welfare. And tell me how you can better accomplish this than to provide homes for the homeless, food for the hungry, and clothing for the naked? To give aid and support to any of our suffering people, is a duty we owe them; to refuse this, is an act of injustice; and especially when destitution has resulted from no delinquency upon their part. How tauntingly cruel to tell laboring-men "to go to work," when they can find no employment! A great disaster has fallen upon the country. It has overtaken those who employ as well as those employed. All feel it alike. Prosperity cannot come so long as half-fed, half-clad laboring-men walk the streets in idleness, and their wives and children go from door to door begging for bread. And this is the case in most of our mining districts and manufacturing towns. There was a time when universal prosperity shone upon us. It has gone. And at a time when the granaries of the great West are filled with corn and the shops of the East are overstocked with all kinds of manufactured goods, gaunt and repulsive want stride through the land. All industries seem paralyzed. It is our duty to make a bold effort for the common relief.

An effort to direct the attention of our people to the cultivation of the soil is the true line of legislative policy.

Our crop of corn the last year was some fifteen hundred million bushels; our crop of wheat nearly a third of that. The two entire products, if sold at the price they generally demand in our eastern markets, would almost cancel the nation's debt. If that debt is ever paid the products of the earth must do it. How immeasurably small do the results of the money and stocks and speculations on change compare with these! Dust only in the balance! With but a trifling commerce upon the sea and but a tithe of our machinery in motion upon the land, and our people in great numbers out of employment, what a spectacle is presented for our reflection and consideration! The policy of the Government seems to be confined to the sale of bonds and taking from the channels of trade what little currency we have that should be employed in the re-establishment of the industries of the land. Bad, in my opinion, is the lesson which teaches the man who has saved $500 to invest it in a Government bond, at 4 per cent., instead of putting it in land for cultivation, or in some useful business pursuits. It is so much dead capital; but small benefit to him, and none to the country. It is the lesson of speculation. It is the fatal lesson of indolence; teaching the idea of living upon the interest upon the bond in the place of manual labor or some useful occupation. Had we an overplus of money beyond the public wants, it might be different; but such is not the fact. The necessities of trade demand an increase of currency; it becomes daily less and less. And this continual pinching and contraction of the circulation of currency falls with heavy weight upon labor. Every dollar hoarded up in bonds is taken from the general stock in trade and withdrawn from the business affairs of the land.

Now, sir, I come to speak of the constitutional objection raised to the bill. It is a remarkable fact that whenever the interests of the man of toil are brought into question the Constitution is thrown across his path. Capital and incorporated associations are not troubled with this stumbling-block in their way. Credit Mobilier may raise its deformed head and throw its bristling mane into the face and eyes of the Constitution, and it disappears. The Constitution! It received its first great blow when the Government divided the receipts of the public lands among the States. Most of them took the spoils. Some of the States hesitated awhile, but finally accepted the glittering bauble. This has been followed by grants to railroads, corporations, and for State purposes of over two hundred millions of acres of the best and most productive land the sun ever shone upon, and gifts of money to capital of over two hundred millions of dollars. If these acts granting these vast subsidies were unconstitutional, what have our courts been about? Has the Constitution slept all this time? The lands thus given away have been placed beyond the reach of the hardy pioneer. He must go now farther west; deeper into the solitudes. The corporation land is good, near by the rail. It has a price put upon it by the owner that is beyond the acquisition of the laboring-man of small means.

What countless blessings would have fallen upon the laboring-men of this country had these gifts by the Government never have been made. These broad acres thus withdrawn from settlement would have been occupied with a prosperous, happy, and industrious people; wealth would have been added to Government, and thousands of penniless people would have rejoiced in all the necessary wants of life, but who now are in poverty. Oh, the Constitution, why is it construed by legislators and courts to protect the rights of the strong and denying its power to aid and comfort the weak! We passed the homestead law in 1862; I was in Congress and gave it my support. Was that less constitutional than a small loan in 1879? I would not invade this sacred deed of our fathers, nor does the bill before us make a single inroad upon the tattered shreds and defaced lineaments of this once grand and noble charter. What there is left of it I would guard and protect. What of it that has been destroyed, let those answer who mutilated its fair proportions.

Mr. BOONE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania under what provision of the Constitution he would justify an appropriation of money for this purpose?

Mr. WRIGHT. Upon the same principle upon which you would justify an appropriation to straighten the channel and course of the Mississippi—for the general welfare; upon the same principle the homestead act was passed; upon the same principle that you loaded our ships with corn to feed starving people in foreign lands; upon the same principle you would provide for those smitten with the plague; upon the same principle that this Government should protect the lives of its people; upon the same principle that the public health and the public prosperity demand the passage of such laws as may be necessary to preserve them. No constitutional barrier stands in the way of legislation by Congress in discharging its duty in the emergencies I have named.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania concede that this law was unconstitutional? If the homestead bill was constitutional why not this in furtherance of it? There are conditions in the bill which may not be in all respects the best, but there is a clause in the Constitution respecting the right of Congress to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. If this can be used to give away land as homesteads and to railroads, why not for a great benevolent object and to relieve suffering labor? I favor the fair consideration of the bill.

Mr. BOONE. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he regards the Constitution as authorizing the appropriations contained in this bill?

Mr. COX, of New York. This law is in furtherance of the homestead law.

Mr. WRIGHT. I never entertained for a moment the thought that the bill was unconstitutional. I said in my answer to the last question of the gentleman from Kentucky that the bill was as constitutional in its character as the appropriation of money to clear out the Mississippi River and other objects, but it is too late in the day for conceding the point that it is unconstitutional after what Congress has done, by the joint action of both Houses, in numerous acts of legislation, if these shall stand as precedents, and when the court has solemnly decided that paper money is coin.

Mr. EDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question upon the constitutional point?

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not propose to discuss the constitutional point further. I would speak of the rights of labor, and if the Constitution comes in conflict with quibbles only, under such an unfounded pretense, it must stand aside. [Laughter.] But happily the dilemma for a quibble is not presented in this bill, and therefore it is needless to speak further in that particular.

Mr. EDEN. Then the Constitution must get out of the way.

Mr. WRIGHT. As it does not happen to be in the way such an inquiry is not pertinent.

The view expressed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is probably a correct one—that Congress has power over the public lands. The grant of the public lands to the settler upon them would carry with it the right of aid connected with the grant. If the gift cannot be made available under the homestead act to all classes of our people, it seems to me that Congress clearly has the power to enforce and extend the original act so as to meet the provisions of this bill. The bill is a supplement to that law.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is a member in this Chamber who does not realize the lack of our wonted prosperity. I do not believe there is a member who does not feel in his heart that we should grant relief in some way to our suffering people, confined mostly to the laboring classes. Assuming that this view is correct, tell me in what measure you will join me. It has occurred to me that the plan

I have introduced into this bill is the most available. You may differ with me as to this. I am content to follow in your lead for any others; I will support almost any measure; but in Heaven's name let us do something. This idea of a small loan or mortgage did not originate in my "lunatic brain." It was the offspring and product of the brain of that great and distinguished "lunatic and demagogue," Benjamin Franklin! A century and a half ago he proposed a like measure for the settlement of the great counties of Bucks and Berks, Lancaster and Chester, then in the Province of Pennsylvania. The same propriety for the measure now is as manifest as it was then. Land and labor should go hand in hand in this country. The one should not be separated from the other. Our common prosperity and future and present greatness rest upon this union.

A distinguished lawyer and eminent judge of New Haven, Connecticut, in writing to me on the subject of this bill, regards it as one of the best and most available means that can be carried out as a remedy for the present distressed state of the country. Undoubtedly, if we can make our waste lands, with a little help upon our part, the happy homes of a suffering people, is it not our absolute duty to do it.

For what are governments instituted? Ours is declared to be "to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

I cannot believe that this the Forty-fifth Congress, now on the eve of its final adjournment, has given that close and careful consideration to those measures which would "promote the general welfare" that it should have done. In all the vast sums of money we have appropriated the "general welfare" has not had very much attention. We have provided food and raiment liberally for the red man, but what have we done for the white? And who come within the broad scope of those constitutional words, the general welfare? Two millions of our fellow-countrymen are to-day out of employment and their children crying for bread. They are not excluded, I hope, from the benefits of the general welfare. The truth is that we have become indifferent to the prayers of this class of people. The power of money and that other power, the press, which in too many instances is under the control of capital, intimidates legislative bodies. They tremble before it. The press has many honorable exceptions, I am glad to assert. Let any one dare talk of the rights of common men, he that moment is denounced as a demagogue or insane. Let them thunder their anathemas and invectives at me. I can sustain their abuse, nor shall it abate a particle of my determination or zeal. My judgment teaches me, and that is my guide, that there is want and destitution in the land, and I shall continue on so long as I am a member of this body striving by all honorable means to procure relief for those of our people who are in a suffering condition. I cannot charge upon my associates here that they are not in accord with me through any want of honesty of purpose; nor that they are less generous than I. I wish that they would bestow more attention upon the subject. Generally the advancement of new ideas are of slow growth in the legislative mind. The masses are almost always ahead in public opinion. They make public opinion.

And, sir, I honestly believe that if the principle of this bill could be submitted to a vote of the people of the Union it would be sustained by an overwhelming majority. I was a member of the Thirty-third Congress. It is more than a quarter of a century ago. Mr. Giddings, of Ohio, was then agitating the question of negro emancipation. He had less than a dozen followers in the House; and probably no man ever received so much personal abuse. But the doctrine that had a dozen supporters in the Thirty-third Congress I suppose has a united voice on the same question in the Forty-fifth. And I, too, was among those who called the old Ohio Representative a "demagogue and a lunatic." The probability is that I was somewhat mistaken. I think so. I cite this as an instance to exhibit a fact, that we should be very cautious how we condemn measures or men till we fully comprehend them, and be careful how we abuse them; and most especially when the mature opinion of a large portion of the educated intelligent people of this country have placed those opinions upon the public record. They are seldom wrong; and, if I do not mistake the conclusion of the popular mind, we shall see that labor will take an equal stand with class and capital, and at no great distance of time ahead. If it does not, then the fault will be their own. It possesses the elements of power; it is only the will that is required to carry out its purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose for a moment that this bill will pass this House at this session. I am but too glad to say that my hopes have been fully realized as to the number who will give their votes for it. I know who they will be; and it is a pleasure to me to find about me gentlemen of their intelligence. I am not alone. But whatever may be the force the bill has in the Forty-fifth Congress I shall hope to add to it in the Forty-sixth. I shall not dispute with gentlemen as to our difference of opinion in the measure nor condemn their views. That shall not destroy our social relations. But, sir, it is impressed upon my mind with all the force and power of conviction that the constitutional clause "to promote the general welfare" carries along with it a command to look after the wants and necessities of the poor fellows who, through no fault of theirs, are out of employment, and they and their wives and children praying to a great and opulent Government for bread.

This command—constitutional command—I shall implicitly obey. I am aware of the low and vulgar abuse that, under the licentious practices of a portion of the American press, I must be subjected to. I have counted its cost. My honest convictions are that the principles of the bill are right and just, before God and man. I shall therefore maintain them to the extent of my ability. I shall not waver in my purpose. My language on all occasions shall be courteous and dignified, as becomes the great measure of national relief that I advocate. Let those who will, use the cant and slang of buffoonery; my words shall be in favor of the great principle I advocate, said in moderation, with due courtesy, and, I hope, with sincerity of purpose. I firmly believe that the bill I advocate, with a single amendment I shall at some future time offer, that the privileges conferred shall be in a pro rata proportion to the number of the citizens of each State and Territory, is the best plan yet suggested for national relief.

And now, sir, let its fate be what it may; I am pledged to stand by it—so long as I am a member of this body, without lack of faith, or shadow of turning.

The great future is before us. Time only shall test the justice and wisdom of those who may favor or oppose the policy of the measure. I am not a prophet. I form my opinions from the same stand-point as those who will cast their votes in opposition to the measure. But I shall record my vote for it with much satisfaction, because it contains the elements of relief; and I leave those who follow me to judge of the propriety of the measure and am willing to abide that judgment under the consciousness that it will meet in the end the approval of my countrymen.

The SPEAKER. The thirty minutes allotted the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask that the gentleman be allowed further time.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that thirty minutes' further time be given my colleague, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am glad you do object; it does me good to have you object. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Well, I do object.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SAYLER. Is this question on a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. The House gave consent for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. EDEN. And the question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SAYLER. And will a majority vote pass the bill?

The SPEAKER. It can.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WRIGHT. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being 53 in the affirmative.

Mr. EWING. Before the roll-call is commenced, I ask unanimous consent that members may have leave to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD remarks touching the provisions of this bill which they have not had an opportunity under the rules to deliver on the floor.

There was no objection; and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. WRIGHT. And I ask permission to publish the balance of what I intended to say. [Laughter.]

There was no objection.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 23, nays 210, not voting 55; as follows:

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] asks to submit in a modified form his proposition to fix the evening of Friday, the 7th of February, for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] who made the objection awhile ago is willing now to withdraw it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask the Clerk to read the proposed order as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Friday evening, February 7, at half past seven o'clock, be specially set aside for reports from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures; but action on any report so made shall be subject to the question of consideration at the time proposed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] agrees to the proposition with the modification which has been read; and our committee has no objection to it in that form.

Mr. CONGER. To the order as modified I make no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the adoption of the order proposed by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask whether it has been decided by the Chair that when a special order is made the question of consideration cannot be raised when the subject comes up at the time assigned?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that when the House under a suspension of the rules or by unanimous consent, which is equivalent thereto, fixes a particular time for the consideration of a bill, the right to raise the question of consideration when the bill is reached is thereby waived, because the order fixes a definite time for the consideration of the particular measure. If its consideration was from day to day, then the Chair would submit the question of consideration at any time because thereby it would not lose in the future a time for consideration; but the measure being fixed for that particular time the Chair holds that the House in making the order debars itself from preventing the consideration of the measure by raising the question of consideration, and must either defeat the proposition upon a motion to lay on the table or other like adverse motion, or prevent the continuance of the session by a motion to adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chair may be right in this ruling, but it has seemed to me that the right to raise the question of consideration connects itself with all business coming before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the ruling is perfectly equitable in its operation. When under a suspension of the rules, or by unanimous consent, which is equivalent to a suspension of the rules, the House determines that particular business shall be taken up at a special time, it works no hardship to any one to construe that order as suspending the rule which gives the right to raise the question of consideration. If a majority of the House are against the bill when it comes up, they can defeat the measure by voting to lay it on the table, or can adopt a motion to adjourn, whereby the business fixed for that particular time loses its place.

Mr. BURCHARD. When a bill which has been made a special order in this way comes up for consideration, would not a motion to postpone be in order if a member obtained the floor to make it?

The SPEAKER. If a member had the floor to make that motion, it would be in order. The order fixing a time for the consideration of particular business merely vacates the right which under the rules allows a member to raise the question of consideration. The House in making the order determines that the business shall be considered at the time appointed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like the Speaker to state whether this is a new ruling or whether it is in accordance with former rulings?

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair does not remember that he has ever made any other ruling. He has recently given a great deal of consideration to this particular question, and thinks that the ruling now under consideration is not only in harmony with the rules but equitable in its operation. It will tend to make the House careful in fixing special orders; for it will be understood that when by suspension of the rules or by unanimous consent a special order is fixed for a particular day and time, on that day the order brings that business up at the time appointed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course I do not wish to controvert the position of the Chair; but it seems to me that when we make special orders we always make them subject to the rules of the House, and one of those rules gives the right to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The measure, when it comes up at the time fixed, is considered under the rules of the House; nothing is waived except the right to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. CONGER. The proposition of the gentleman from Georgia having been modified so as to provide that the question of consideration may be raised upon any business brought up at the time suggested, I make no further objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to add a single remark upon this point. When the House fixes a time for the consideration of particular business, it practically suspends at that very instant the rule which gives the right to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. CONGER. What was added was added at my suggestion that in the motion to suspend the rules or to give unanimous consent the question of consideration in each case was reserved.

The SPEAKER. That is part of the order in this case.

Mr. CONGER. That is what I say; that in each case that question can be raised.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has this assignment made for that evening with the understanding that so far as that evening is concerned any bill the committee may report shall have the right reserved to have the question of consideration raised against it.

Mr. HALE. All questions of order being reserved.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. HALE. I wish the gentleman would set a day instead of an evening, but I do not feel like objecting on that account. The gentleman from Georgia on looking it over has determined what is best for him to do, but I wish to say from my experience these assignments of special orders, unless for the ordinary business of the House which must go through, fail to bring out a quorum of members, and the evening sessions are spent in wrangling over questions of order or in calls of the House. I do not think it is proper to set apart evenings which will be so abused. In this case I will waive my objection in deference to the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that it rests with the body of the House, and not with the Chair.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; and I am taking to myself some blame for yielding out of good nature to the gentleman from Georgia, which I am going to do, but hereafter I will not do it.

The motion of Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, was then agreed to HEAD-STONES OVER GRAVES OF UNION SOLDIERS.

Mr. HASKELL. I move, Mr. Speaker, to suspend the rules and pass a bill (S. No. 1060) authorizing the Secretary of War to erect head-stones over the graves of Union soldiers who have been interred in private, village, or city cemeteries. I wish to say it involves no appropriation.

The bill was read, as follows:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to erect head-stones over the graves of soldiers who served in the regular or volunteer Army of the United States during the war for the Union, and who have been buried in private, village, or city cemeteries, in the same manner as provided by the law of March 3, 1873, for those interred in national military cemeteries; and for this purpose, and for the expenses incident to such work so much of the appropriation of $1,000,000 made in the act above mentioned, as has not been expended, and as may be necessary, is hereby made available.

The Secretary of War shall cause to be preserved in the records of his Department the names and places of burial of all soldiers for whom such head-stones shall have been erected by the authority of this or any former act.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

NEW PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. —) entitled an act for the erection of certain public buildings therein specified.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase sites for and cause to be erected suitable buildings, with proper fire-proof vaults, at the places and for the purposes hereinafter specified, the several sites and buildings thereon when completed, upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the amounts hereinafter specified.

For custom-house, post-office, United States court-rooms, at Augusta, Georgia, not to exceed $100,000.

For court-rooms and other purposes of the United States at Oxford, Mississippi, not to exceed $50,000.

For court-rooms and other purposes of the United States at Key West, Florida, not to exceed $100,000.

For court-rooms and other purposes of the United States at Lynchburgh, Virginia, not to exceed $75,000.

For post-office, United States court-rooms, land office, and revenue offices at Montgomery, Alabama, not to exceed $150,000.

For post-office, United States court-rooms, internal-revenue offices, and other purposes of the United States at Brooklyn, New York, not to exceed the sum of $250,000.

For court-rooms and other purposes of the United States at La Crosse, Wisconsin, not to exceed $65,000.

For court-rooms and other purposes of the United States at Erie, Pennsylvania, not to exceed $150,000.

For court-rooms and other purposes of the United States at Greensborough, North Carolina, not to exceed $50,000.

For court-rooms and other purposes of the United States at Council Bluffs, Iowa, not to exceed $75,000.

And one-half of the said several sums affixed as the limits of each building and site herein provided for is hereby appropriated out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated for the purposes hereof, except for the building at Oxford, Mississippi, for which the sum of $50,000 is appropriated: Provided, Said appropriations shall not be available until valid titles to the sites of said several buildings shall be vested in the United States and until the said several States wherein they are situated shall severally have conceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of the said several States and the service of any criminal process thereon.

Mr. MILLS. Is there any provision in that bill for any building in the State of Texas? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to answer with certainty but thinks there is not.

Mr. EDEN. Let me make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is this the report of any committee?

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. There is nothing in the bill for the State of Ohio either.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to answer.

Mr. EDEN. As there are in this bill ten or fifteen new buildings provided for, I should like to know from the Chair whether there is any mode under the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee by which we can have a separate vote on each particular building?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the right to ask a parliamentary question.

Mr. EDEN. Is there any way by which we can have a separate vote on each building?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is not susceptible of division.

Mr. EDEN. If the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee is voted down, can we have a separate vote on each proposition?

The SPEAKER. In that event the bill will not be before the House at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the House ought to know if this is a report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HUMPHREY. This is a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. That committee reported these bills favorably last session.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MILLS, there were—ayes 115, noes 50.

Mr. SAPP. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 32; not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. FORT. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITTHORNE and Mr. MILLS were appointed.

Mr. KILLINGER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. If this question goes over and we adjourn now, will it not come up next Monday?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. KILLINGER. What is the use, then, of adjourning now?

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 136.

So the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 154, nays 80, not voting 54; as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the memorial exercises in honor of Professor Henry, held in the Hall of the House of Representatives on the 16th of January, 1879, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that 15,000 extra copies of the same be printed in a memorial volume together with such articles as may be furnished by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; 7,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and 5,000 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

HAYDEN'S REPORT FOR 1876.

The VICE-PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed and bound at the Government Printing Office, for the use of the Department of the Interior, 2,000 copies of Professor Hayden's tenth annual report of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories for 1876, uniform with the edition ordered by Congress.

HAYDEN'S ATLAS OF COLORADO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That whenever the proper officer having charge thereof shall have received a sufficient number of orders for Professor Hayden's Atlas of Colorado, accompanied by the cost price thereof with 10 per cent. additional, to warrant, in his opinion, the expense of putting the plates to press, he shall cause an edition thereof to be published: Provided, however, That the number thus printed shall in no case exceed the number actually ordered and paid for in advance of said publication.

EMBEZZLEMENT BY REVENUE OFFICERS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1151) to amend section 5497 of the Revised Statutes, to which he invites the attention of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The amendment of the House was read, being to amend the title of the bill by adding thereto the words:

Relating to embezzlement by officers of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Chair let that be laid aside a moment? I do not remember the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the House will lie on the table temporarily.

Mr. EDMUNDS subsequently said: I have no objection to the amendment of the title. I move to concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire from what committee of the Senate this bill came originally?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. From the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say as one member of the committee that I think the House is quite right in this amendment, and that it must have been inadvertent in the committee, certainly it would have been in me had I been present, to report any bill referring arbitrarily to a section of the Revised Statutes by number, without designating it in any way so that it could be carried into the index. I am quite sure I speak for all the members of the Judiciary Committee when I say they think the amendment of the House is a proper one in that respect.

The amendment was concurred in.

FEBRUARY TWENTY-SECOND.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair also lays before the Senate the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 623) to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the District of Columbia, so as to make the 22d day of February a holiday within said District. The Chair invites the attention of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY,] the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to this amendment.

The amendment of the House was read, being in line 7 of the bill to strike out "1878" and insert "1879."

Mr. DORSEY. That amendment ought to be concurred in, I think. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES E. ANDERSON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a copy of the testimony of James E. Anderson, given before the committee of the House of Representatives on investigation of alleged frauds in the electoral vote of the States of Louisiana and Florida, so far as it affects Hon. STANLEY MATTHEWS, a Senator from the State of Ohio, communicated by the House of Representatives to the Senate in response to the resolution of the Senate of December 10, 1878.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the testimony be referred to the special committee having charge of that subject, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the river and harbor act of June 18, 1878, a letter from the Chief of Engineers and a report of Major F. W. Farquhar, Corps of Engineers, on surveys of the Mississippi River at and near Alexandria, Missouri, and of the harbor of Quincy, Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PADDOCK presented the petition of F. Engelliard and others, citizens of Nebraska, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Rising City to York City, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. KERNAN presented a letter from John L. French, acting assistant postmaster-general, in relation to the establishment of a post-route between New Kirk Mills and Arietta, in the State of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Charles J. Brockway, of Newburyport, Massachusetts, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Thomas C. Brophy, of Boston, praying that a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD be sent to each of the free public libraries in the various towns of the United States during the sessions of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MORRILL. I present a memorial of the Capitol Hill and East Washington Improvement Association, in relation to the site for the Congressional Library. I move that the memorial, with the accompanying documents, be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I present the petition of Maria Sochar, Barbara Springler, and several other ladies, of Norton County, Nebraska, praying for indemnity for property destroyed by the Indians on the plains. While the Cheyennes were on their flight from the Indian Territory last fall, in passing through Kansas and Nebraska, a number of persons were killed, and among the rest were the husbands of two of these women. Besides the loss of their husbands, their property was also taken, and inasmuch as the Government did not protect them they claim that they have a right to indemnity, or at least a return for the amount of property destroyed. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented the petition of James S. Dungan and others, citizens of New Castle, Delaware, praying for an appropriation for the erection of a building in that city for the accommodation of the post-office and the deputy collector of customs; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BAYARD. I present the memorial of certain pilots, captains, vessel owners, and citizens of Lewes, Delaware, and vicinity, interested in the navigation of Delaware Bay, and particularly the harbor formed by the Delaware breakwater, setting forth the necessity of an appropriation for the removal of certain wrecks from the harbor caused by the breakwater. The memorial is signed by gentlemen whom I recognize as being deeply interested in and thoroughly informed of the matters whereof they speak.

I beg leave also to say that this harbor is a shelter not to the commerce of that bay, large as it is, but to the entire coastwise commerce of the United States. The point is one of the most important on the coast where shelter can be found from storm and danger in a very short period of time. The appropriation would not be a very large one, but it is essential, and essential I think to be obtained at once. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD presented the petition of Miss M. M. S. Clemson and 10 other ladies, of Claymont, Delaware, praying for the passage of an act making effective the anti-polygamy law of 1862; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented the petition of Alfred E. Jaques, postmaster at Wilton, New Hampshire, praying for the passage of a law remunerating him for loss occasioned by the robbery of the post-office at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the memorial of G. W. Worthen and others, citizens of Lebanon, New Hampshire, remonstrating against the reduction of the tax on manufactured tobacco and cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALLACE presented the memorial of the city council of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying for an appropriation for completing Davis Island dam across the Ohio, and also for testing plans for the improvement of the Alleghany River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MAXEY presented the memorial of the principal chief and delegates of the Cherokee Nation of Indians, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 230 and House bill No. 228, authorizing the so-called "eastern band" of the Cherokees (citizens of North Carolina) to sue the Cherokee Nation; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of the College of Physicians of Philadelphia, signed by its officers, praying the publication by Congress of the subject-catalogue of the library of the Surgeon-General's Office; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Elizabeth Bradfield, of Henderson County, Tennessee; the petition of Amanda McKey, of Henderson County, Tennessee; and the petition of Martha I. Wilkinson, of Henderson County, Tennessee, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of W. W. Frybayer, late colonel of Maryland artillery, now of the Soldiers' Home, Dayton, Ohio, praying to be allowed an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LAMAR presented the petition of Edward Fontaine, of Louisiana, praying that certain plans of his invention for improving the navigation of harbors and rivers, together with the necessary maps and diagrams, be printed under his supervision and at the expense of the Government; which was referred to the Select Committees on the Levees of the Mississippi River.

Mr. WITHERS. I present the petition of D. M. W. Nash, of Portsmouth, Virginia, praying for the removal of his political disabilities. This petition is presented in consequence of an irregularity in a previous petition for the same purpose. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

LABOR STATISTICS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I am charged with the presentation to the Senate of a memorial upon the labor problem. It was placed in my hands by Mr. W. Godwin Moody, of Boston, the author of a treatise on the subject, which shows him to be a close observer and student. These memorialists represent that multitudes of our people, popularly estimated by millions, are unemployed, and that this state of things demoralizes all our industrial interests, and calls upon Congress to ascertain the cause of the evil and its remedy. They complain that while the Government expends much time and money in ascertaining and improving the condition of our foreign trade, which does not exceed 5 per cent. of the great aggregate, it does absolutely nothing in the way of comprehensive effort in behalf of the 95 per cent. which is supposed to represent the home trade and consumption.

They do not believe, nor do I, that the problem can be solved by any theory based on data not known to be reliable. What they want is authoritative information obtained by the Government to inform the people of their real condition, and on which to predicate wise legislation. Such information can be taken as a safe basis for reasoning on this important subject, and without it there can be no correct reasoning at all.

To the end, therefore, that accurate statistics of every industry that employs labor may be procured, and the number and condition of the people who are at work or idle ascertained, these memorialists pray for the establishment of a separate bureau to have special charge of all industrial and trade interests, both foreign and domestic. In the mean time, as a new census is about to be taken, they ask, among other things, that the enumerators make report of the condition of every person over sixteen years of age, whether employed or unemployed, and, if unemployed, during what portion of the preceding year. This important information, I am advised, has never been obtained by any government.

Finally, as a preliminary step in solving our labor difficulty, they pray for the appointment of a special commission to inquire to what extent machinery has taken the place of manual labor in general production and manufacture, and what have been the general effects, in order to determine the legislation, if any, that is required to replace the labor that machinery has displaced.

This memorial, I am informed, has three thousand one hundred and ninety names attached to it, representing sixteen States, from Massachusetts to Texas. The first signature is that of a philanthropic woman of New York, Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson. Then follows a long list of some of the best-known names in Massachusetts. Among these are the governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of State, treasurer, auditor, chief of the labor bureau, secretary of State charities; the mayors of Boston, Cambridge, Lynn, Lawrence, and Salem; Ex-Governor Gaston, Judge Abbott, and Wendell Phillips; Professor Pierce, of Harvard College, and its librarian; the editors of all the daily and religious press of Boston, eminent clergymen of the city, the collector of the port, and representatives of more than one hundred of the mercantile, manufacturing, and commercial houses of Boston.

It also bears the names of Smith Ely, the late mayor of New York, and George William Curtis, of that city; Mr. Corcoran, and other distinguished citizens of Washington; the mayors of Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Trenton, and business firms throughout the country. It is also signed by a large number of artisans, mechanics, and laboring-men. Mr. Moody, in handing it to me for presentation to the Senate, happily observed, "that it was the joint prayer of culture, wealth, and labor."

Whatever differences of opinion there may be, Mr. President, as to the cause of our labor difficulties, it is quite evident that the way out of them cannot be found without the statistical information asked for, and that the requests contained in the petition are reasonable and entitled to the careful consideration of Congress. And I am happy to say that the Special Committee on the Census have taken action on some of the subjects embraced in the memorial.

Mr. President, the labor question forces itself upon the attention of Congress and the country. It has already engaged a body of earnest thinkers and will enlist still more. The statesman who can bring it to a successful solution, so that every man willing to work can obtain employment, will receive the love and gratitude of his countrymen, and leave to history an imperishable name.

I move, sir, the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HOAR. In regard to the subject concerning which the Senator from Illinois has addressed the Senate, I think it proper to say and to remind him, as perhaps the subject may be somewhat new to his investigation, that a bill such as the memorialists pray for, to provide for taking the statistics of the condition of the laboring persons in this country, passed the House of Representatives in the last Congress but one almost by a unanimous vote. I had the honor of drawing and introducing the bill, and it received the nearly unanimous assent of the House of Representatives. It was defeated in the Senate after a considerable discussion, partly I think in consequence of a want of apprehension of the scope and purpose of the bill.

While the men who have represented what may be termed the discontent of labor in this country and in Europe have advanced many unwise propositions, advocated many unwise and unjustifiable schemes, and have been sometimes very far astray in their notions of political economy and finance, they have united almost without an exception in praying of the several governments under which they live the initiation of measures which by the obtaining of proper and suitable statistics would throw light upon the condition of the laboring classes throughout Christendom, and upon the effect of the existing laws in relation to currency, finance, trade, protection, and other great subjects of legislation. The one thing upon which all this class of persons seem to have agreed, differing as they do among themselves in regard to other matters, is the desire that the Government would obtain for the laboring classes this statistical information for its own use and for their benefit. I have been amazed at the indifference, especially of this body, to the request of this vast number of laborers in this country, when it has been preferred heretofore, and when it has met the assent of the other branch of Congress. I trust the honorable Senator from Illinois will be successful in getting the favorable attention of the Senate to a proposition which has failed to receive it heretofore.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORT OF ENTOMOLOGICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print 10,000 copies of the second report of the United States entomological commission, to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed 10,000 copies of the second report of the United States entomological commission; 5,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 1,000 for the use of the commission.

The resolution was reported from the Committee on Printing with amendments, to make it read:

That there be printed 5,000 copies of the second report of the United States entomological commission; 3,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 500 for the use of the commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island to let the resolution lie over for a day. I should like to make an inquiry of the entomologist in respect to the number of volumes authorized to be printed. It strikes me that the amendments are very wrong.

Mr. ANTHONY. The number is reduced to the number printed of the first volume. The Senate passed a resolution like the original of this resolution for the first volume, but the House reduced the number one-half; and the Committee on Printing have reduced the number to be printed of the second volume one-half so as to make the number correspond with the number printed of the first volume.

Mr. PADDOCK. My recollection is that a very much larger number of the first volume was printed than is provided for the second volume even in the House resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to let the resolution lie over. The Senator from Nebraska can take charge of it and call it up after he looks into the matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

INSECTS AFFECTING COTTON.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print 30,000 copies of the special report from the Department of Agriculture on insects affecting the cotton-plant, to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed 30,000 copies of the special report from the Department of Agriculture on the insects affecting the cotton-plant, with the necessary illustrations, to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing; 15,000 of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 10,000 for the use of the Senate, and 5,000 for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

The resolution was reported from the Committee on Printing with amendments:

That there be printed 10,000 copies of the special report from the Department of Agriculture on the insects affecting the cotton-plant, with the necessary illustrations, to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing; 5,000 of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and 2,000 for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. PADDOCK. It strikes me that the amendments ought not to be adopted, and that the House resolution provides for the printing of no more copies of this report than ought to be printed. I call the attention of Senators representing the States in which cotton is the staple product to this matter.

Mr. SARGENT. The committee have made provision for a very liberal printing of this report. It is one which, although important, is local. The Representatives from most of the States have no occasion for these books, and very readily, as they do in all such cases, will give them to their brother Senators and Representatives who are interested, so that one-half or perhaps one-third of the number of copies ordinarily printed of this book will supply the demand. The committee thought the number provided in the amendments was very large indeed. Although the demand is local, it is, I think, a very important document. The trouble is that this business of printing grows upon our hands, so that it seems to be almost uncontrollable and we have to keep it down to answering the purposes of the Printing Office and of distribution. The amount provided for by the amendment is very large, and hereafter if it shall be found necessary to print an additional edition it may be done at that time from the stereotype plates without much greater cost than if the printing were ordered now. I think the Senate had better pass the resolution as reported from the committee.

Mr. PADDOCK. So far as printing and providing information on the subject of agriculture is concerned, I for one insist upon the most liberal rule possible. If there is to be a curtailment in the printing of public matter, let it come from another source, and in regard to other matters. However, if Senators whose constituencies are more specially interested in the cotton production are satisfied with the amendments of the Committee on Printing, I certainly shall not oppose them for one.

Mr. SARGENT. One remark, Mr. President. We print more of the agricultural reports than we print of any other of public documents. We take great pains to distribute agricultural information. But I think the agriculturists as well as other classes of citizens do not desire that even to disseminate such information they shall be taxed inordinately, and it is to keep down taxation of that class, and of all other classes, that we try to restrain extravagant printing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the Committee on Printing.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1721) for the relief of Edward Shields and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under similar request, and without committing myself to any views about the bill, I ask leave to introduce a bill without previous notice.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1722) authorizing the President to prescribe suitable police regulations for the government of the various Indian reservations, and to provide for the punishment of the crimes of murder, manslaughter, arson, rape, burglary, and robbery committed upon the various Indian reservations; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1723) granting arrears of pension to Mrs. Jane Dulaney; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORDON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1724) granting the right of way to the Atlantic and Mexican Gulf Canal Company, of Georgia and Florida, through the lands and waters of the United States along said canal route; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1725) for the erection of a building for a post-office and United States courts in San Francisco, California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BRUCE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1726) for the relief of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1727) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to remit certain charges, penalties, commissions, interest, and other expenses, upon payment of the original amounts of the general and special taxes and assessments recited within the act within ninety days from and after the passage of the act, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MORRILL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1591) to provide additional accommodations for the Library of Congress; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes herein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

ADMISSION TO CORRIDOR AND MARBLE ROOM.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the following resolution after consultation with a great many Senators on both sides, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That during the remainder of the present session of the Senate no person not entitled to the privileges of the floor shall be admitted to the corridor in rear of the Senate Chamber, or to the Marble Room.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. WITHERS. Let it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia objects, and the resolution goes over.

COMPETING TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Railroads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing railroad companies operating interstate railroads to construct and operate lines of telegraph for commercial purposes; and of authorizing the connection of lines of different companies, with a view of encouraging competition in the telegraphic business of the country, and to report by bill or otherwise.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I call up the bill (S. No. 1685) to provide for taking the tenth and subsequent censuses, in accordance with previous notice that it would be called up this morning after the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, but the Senator from Vermont asks the Senate to take up the bill he has indicated.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the request of the Senator from Vermont for unanimous consent?

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir. I suppose as a matter of business the bill will come up in its regular order this morning.

Mr. HARRIS. The unfinished business of the Senate I think is another matter that I hope the Senate will vote upon and end very promptly; and I feel constrained to ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution under which the Senate is considering the calender of general orders now operates until half past one o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I move to postpone that and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 1685.

Mr. HOWE. I want to interpose a word here, addressed quite as much to the Senator from Vermont as to the Senate. I gave notice the other day that this morning I would ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a bill which I am sure the Senator from Vermont takes deep interest in—a bill to provide additional accommodations for the Library of Congress. The Senator from Vermont has obtained the floor and has first submitted his motion to the Senate, and I am rather too discreet a man to come in collision with the Senator from Vermont when I can avoid it. Unless the Senator will in the exercise of his own excellent judgment allow me to submit that motion, I shall have to defer it until a more convenient season, I am afraid.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I am anxious to have action upon the bill to which he refers. I desire also to say to him that I this morning introduced an amendment to the bill, which is not yet printed but will be printed by to-morrow, and also a memorial containing various documents and facts that I think may be essential to the consideration of the subject. Therefore I ask the Senator to allow the bill to go over at least until to-morrow when the amendment and the memorial with the accompanying documents shall be printed both for his information and my own.

Mr. HOWE. I shall acquiesce the more readily because the Senator seems to be himself employed in expediting that piece of legislation. He has already, as he says, prepared one amendment. I again renew the request that other Senators whose views may differ from those presented in the bill and may differ from those presented in the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont will prepare such amendments as they desire to move and have them ready for the sitting to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to give notice, as I do every day and did yesterday and the day before and so on indefinitely backward, that as soon as Warren Mitchell (who seems to be more important to a majority of the Senate than any other public consideration) is disposed of, if not sooner, I shall move to take up the resolutions that have been so often referred to, whatever stands in the way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to move that Friday after the morning hour be set apart for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Military Affairs. There are about seventy-five bills on the Calendar from that committee, and I should like to have Friday set apart for that business. I make that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to that motion. You would have to change the rules to do that. And making that objection I wish to say to my friend from Alabama that I think experience has shown over and over again that setting apart a particular day for particular committees is injurious to the proper transaction of public business. We shall not do any more business in the whole in that way; and we shall do it a great deal better if we take the Calendar in the order in which cases have been reported from all committees.

Mr. SPENCER. I suppose a single objection puts my motion over until to-morrow. I give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside, and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the census bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Before that is voted on I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Vermont: whether it is his expectation to press that bill to a vote to-day, or whether he simply wants it taken up in order that he may address the Senate? I feel very much indisposed to consent to the disposition of that bill to-day. It is a bill very few persons have studied yet, and it requires, I think, a great deal of study. If the Senator only wishes to have it called up for the purpose of addressing the Senate upon it, I certainly will assist in getting it up.

Mr. MORRILL. Oh, no, Mr. President. The committee on the part of the Senate have reported this bill unanimously, and I desire to have it taken up and acted upon to-day. I think when it is read and explained it will not take a great deal of time, and I do not propose myself to occupy more than a very brief time in making simply a plain statement in explanation of the provisions of the bill. I shall occupy not more than fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. THURMAN. There will be several amendments offered to that bill, and it cannot pass in a hurry, I take it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 17.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I ought to have known, but I must confess I did not know, that the Senator from Vermont intended or had given notice that to-day, being the 28th, he would call up a bill reported on the 23d of January. The bill is not a simple one, nor does it relate to a trifling or simple subject. Those who have been long in the Senate will remember that on the last occasion of taking the census there was a good deal of discussion in the Senate on this subject. That discussion took place a year later relatively than this. I believe in every instance a census bill has been passed a year later relatively than this; and therefore it was that I did not understand that the committee deemed it important so promptly to act on this subject.

However, that is no excuse; and I should have been ready to vote upon this bill, but I am not. I observe it provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall on or before the 1st of April, 1880, proceed to appoint supervisors of the census. The Senate will see that before April, 1880, if the Government continues, there will be some months of congressional session, and therefore I had not supposed it was important that at this session at all a census bill should be adopted. I know it has been said—it was said ten years ago—that it was important it should be done a year in advance. The Senate and House then thought otherwise, and on that occasion the bill was passed some time after the 1st of January of the year on which the census was to be taken.

Now, like the Senator from Ohio, I think this an important bill, and I should like to have, as I have not had an opportunity to be able to understand it myself and to receive the understanding of several persons whom I know, and who have large information on this subject, some of them here and some of them elsewhere.

Therefore, although accustomed to vote for any motion made by the honorable Senator from Vermont, it would convenience me at all events, as the Senator from Ohio says it would him, if this bill could stand for a few days until we can know more about it. I certainly could not vote upon it to-day intelligently; to be quite frank about it, I see some provisions in the bill which I do not think I could vote for on any day unless new light, which we did not have before on some equivalent proposition should be presented.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. PLUMB, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I believe I am paired on this question with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.] I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—23.

BILLS OBJECTED TO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar of general orders.

The bill (H. R. No. 1888) for the relief of Macon, Georgia, which was reported adversely from the Committee on Claims, was announced as the bill regularly in order on the Calendar.

Mr. SARGENT. I move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON. I did not hear that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again reported.

The bill was read.

Mr. GORDON. I ask that that go over.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The vote to postpone indefinitely will be regarded as reconsidered, and the bill will stand on the Calendar going over. The next bill will be read.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 910) for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

Mr. ALLISON. That will lead to debate.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does an objection take the bill over?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. McMILLAN. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution (S. R. No. 19) in reference to the disapproval of an act of the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. ALLISON. That will lead to debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I guess not. I do not believe it will. That is a simple act. It had better be read.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not think that resolution will lead to any debate. I ask that it be read in full.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read in full, and then objection will be called for.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it is provided by section 1850 of the Revised Statutes of the United States that all laws passed by the Legislative Assembly and governor of any Territory, except in the Territories of Colorado, Dakota, Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming, shall be submitted to Congress, and, if disapproved, shall be null and of no effect; and

Whereas it is also provided by section 1889 of the Revised Statutes that the Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories shall not grant private charters or especial privileges, but they may, by general incorporation acts, permit persons to associate themselves together as bodies corporate for mining, manufacturing, and other industrial pursuits, or the construction or operation of railroads, wagon-roads, irrigating-ditches, and the colonization and improvement of lands in connection therewith, or for colleges, seminaries, churches, libraries, or any benevolent, charitable, or scientific association; and

Whereas the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona has passed an act entitled "An act to secure the construction and operation of certain railroad and telegraph lines, and to provide for other matters relating thereto," which was approved by the governor of said Territory on the 7th day of February, A. D. 1877; and

Whereas from an examination thereof said act of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory is found to be a private charter, by special act creating the Southern Pacific Railroad Company a corporation within said Territory, with perpetual succession, without any reservation of the right of amendment or repeal, for the purpose of constructing lines of railroad and telegraph into and across said Territory, one as near as may be on the line of the thirty-fifth parallel of north latitude and the other as near as may be to the line of the thirty-second parallel of north latitude, and to that end conferring on said corporation certain especial privileges, amongst others an exemption, for a period of years, of all the property of said corporation from taxation, and granting to said corporation the right to regulate the time and manner in which passengers and property shall be transported over its road, and the tolls or compensation to be paid therefor, with no limitation thereon, except a maximum of ten cents per mile for each passenger and fifteen cents per mile for each ton, by weight or measurement, of freight transported on its roads: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, entitled as aforesaid, and hereinbefore recited, be, and the same is hereby, disapproved.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that that resolution go over. I want to examine it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The consideration of the resolution is objected to. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 306) amendatory of the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon."

Mr. EDMUNDS. We cannot pass any railroad bills within the morning hour, evidently, either for Arizona or Oregon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 474) to authorize the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to extend its railroad and telegraph line easterly from its eastern terminus in Arizona to a point on the Rio Grande at or near El Paso and to aid in building the same.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a railroad bill too, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 942) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a railroad bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

NATIONAL BANK OF WESTERN ARKANSAS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 250) for the relief of the National Bank of Western Arkansas, which was reported adversely from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DORSEY. I move that that bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 109) defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives;

An act (S. No. 605) for the relief of William M. Kendall;

An act (S. No. 753) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico; and

An act (S. No. 854) for the adjudication of title to lands claimed by José Apis and Pablo Apis, in the State of California.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 5315) to restore the records and files in the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas, lately destroyed by fire; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

RICHMOND FEMALE INSTITUTE.

The bill (S. No. 61) for the relief of the Richmond Female Institute, of Richmond, Virginia, was announced to be the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HOAR March 18, 1878:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 61) for the relief of the Richmond Female Institute, of Richmond, Virginia, have considered the same and report that it ought to pass.

This bill has already passed both Houses, but failed to be presented to the President in time to receive his signature before adjournment. The petitioners are an incorporated charitable institution. April 9, 1865, their buildings were taken possession of for Army headquarters and occupied as such and for the Freedmen's Bureau until October 10, 1866. A board of officers was convened by General Terry, under orders from Major-General Turner, who, after hearing evidence, found $400 a month to be a reasonable rent for the premises. This rent was paid by the quartermaster until October 1, 1865. Payment of rent then ceased by order of the Quartermaster-General, who subsequently recommended the payment of rent from April 2, 1866, but claimed the right to compel repayment of the rent paid from April to October, 1865, as having been received by the institute contrary to law.

We are of opinion, first, that the United States having voluntarily paid the rent from October to April, 1865, there is no reason for attempting to recover it back; second, that the rent from April 6 to October 10, 1866, is clearly due to the petitioners, the United States having used and occupied their premises after the close of the war and the complete restoration of the authority of the United States.

As to the period from October 1, 1865, to April 2, 1866, the owners' claim lacks the technical foundation of the assent of the Quartermaster-General to the contract of hiring. But the premises were taken and occupied under an assurance that they should be paid for, given by the commander of the department and approved by his successor. This was long after the actual termination of hostilities, and when a hostile capture of private property for purposes of military use would have been justly regarded by the whole country as an act of unjustifiable severity. Under such circumstances, where the commanding officer, instead of destroying or taking as enemies' property an institution of learning, sees fit to treat it otherwise and to hire it, in our judgment public policy requires that his act should be ratified.

The committee further submit, for the information of the Senate, a report made from the Committee on Claims, April 26, 1876, by Mr. COCKRELL, relating to the same case——

Mr. HOAR. It is not necessary to read the appended report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear it.

The Secretary proceeded to read a report submitted by Mr. COCKRELL, April 26, 1876.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time within which the Calendar of general orders is to be considered under the special order has expired, and the Senate will resume the consideration of its unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of this report, which is nearly completed, may be finished; otherwise it will have to be read all over again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report submitted by Mr. COCKRELL, April 26, 1876, as follows:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the Richmond Female Institute, through its trustees and treasurer, Wellington Goddin, have duly considered the same, and submit the following report:

"The Richmond Female Institute was duly incorporated by the Legislature of the State of Virginia on March 2, 1853, for the education of females, and placed under the charge and control of a board of trustees, with a treasurer, and Wellington Goddin was duly appointed treasurer, and has ever since continued and now is the treasurer, duly qualified and acting.

"Soon after incorporation, large and expensive buildings were erected for school purposes, and a female school opened and continued.

"On the 9th day of April, 1865, Colonel James, quartermaster, took possession of the institute buildings for Army headquarters for General Schofield. Very soon afterward the treasurer, Mr. Goddin, made application to Colonel James for rent, and the matter was referred to the commanding officer, and a board of officers was convened by General Terry, under orders of Major-General Turner, to estimate and determine the rate of rent or rental value of the institute buildings.

"In July, 1865, this board of officers duly met and considered the question of rent, heard evidence, and decided that the institute buildings so used by the Army were reasonably worth $400 per month.

"About October 24, 1865, Colonel James, the quartermaster, in pursuance of the estimate and decision of the board of officers, paid to Treasurer Goddin the rent, at the rate of $400 per month, from April 9, 1865, to October 1, 1865, amounting to $2,293. Application for this payment of rent was made about October 1, 1865.

"The buildings were occupied for Army purposes, and were necessary for such purposes, up to October 10, 1866. Rent is now claimed at the rate of $400 per month from October 1, 1865, to October 10, 1866, amounting to $4,933.33.

"No rent was paid after said payment made October 24, 1865, as above stated.

"October 25, 1865, by order of the Quartermaster-General, the further payment of rent was stopped.

"July 31, 1866, a claim for rent from October 1, 1865, to August 1, 1866, ten months, was presented, and General Terry, commanding at Richmond, indorsed on same:

"'The building of the Baptist Female Institute was seized immediately after the evacuation of Richmond for the headquarters of the department, and is still occupied as such. I propose to restore it to its owners on the 1st of September. Inasmuch as it belongs to an educational and charitable institution, which could not have taken part in the rebellion, I respectfully recommend that this bill for rent be paid.'

"August 28, 1866, Hons. Joseph Segar and Parker, of Virginia, applied to have the buildings restored.

"September 7, 1866, General Schofield, commanding at Richmond, indorsed the same as follows:

"'Respectfully returned to the War Department, with report that the building referred to accommodates all the officers connected with department headquarters, including those of the Freedmen's Bureau, and that no other suitable building can be obtained for the purpose in Richmond.

"'Therefore I cannot consent to the proposed surrender of the building. But I recommend, for the reasons stated by General Terry in the within indorsement of July 31, that the claim for rent be paid.'

"February 26, 1867, the following letter was addressed to the Secretary of War, namely:

"QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., February 26, 1867.

"SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the papers in the claim of the Richmond Female Institute, through Wellington Goddin, treasurer, for the use of the building by the military authorities from April 2, 1866, to October 12, 1866, at the rate of $400 per month, amount, as stated, $2,533.33, said rental being fixed by a board convened by General Terry, the claim having been referred to this office by the War Department, January 18, 1867, together with previous papers, for report.

"I have the honor to report that a claim for rent of this property, amounting to $4,000, was presented August 15, 1866, by Rev. J. B. Jeter, which was returned disallowed August 17, 1866, by reason of 'the building being used as a hospital by the rebels; the owners were rebels. It was a public building in a captured city, and the sum of $2,293 has already been paid contrary to the rules and orders governing the Quartermaster's Department.'

"November 9, 1866, the claim was received back, and on the 14th of that month it was returned to the Third Auditor, again disallowed. The following extract appears in the letter to the Third Auditor: 'No rent can be paid for this property previous to April 2, 1866, the date of the President's proclamation, as existing orders from the War Department forbid the payment of rents for property used by the United States in the late rebellious States before that time.'

"January 4, 1867, E. M. Garnett, attorney, forwards to General Blunt amended account, dating from April 2, 1866, which account is referred by the War Department, January 18, 1867, for report, (as previously herein stated.)

"In view of the facts as stated, I respectfully recommend that payment of rent be allowed the claimant, at a rate to be approved by the commanding general of Department of the Potomac, from April 2, 1866, during period of United States occupation of the premises: provided, that the amount of rent paid previous to April 2, 1866, $2,293, be deducted from the amount which may be due for rent since April 2, 1866, the date of the proclamation of the President.

"It appears from the papers and the evidence on file with the commission that this claim comes within the prohibitory clauses of the act of Congress approved July 4, 1864, as amended and construed by an act passed by the Thirty-ninth Congress, entitled 'An act to declare the sense of an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and commissary supplies furnished to the Army of the United States,"' received by the President on the 9th of February, 1867, which amendatory act provides that the aforesaid act of July 4, 1864, 'shall not be construed to authorize the settlement of any claim for supplies or stores taken or furnished for the use of, or used by, the armies of the United States; nor for the occupation of, or injury to, real estate; nor for the consumption, appropriation, or destruction of, or damage to, personal property by the military authorities or troops of the United States, where such claim originated during the war for the suppression of the southern rebellion, in a State, or part of a State, declared in insurrection by the proclamation of the President of the United States dated July 1, 1862, or in a State which, by an ordinance of secession, attempted to withdraw from the United States Government.'

"Acting Quartermaster General, Brevet Major-General.

"This decision was approved by the Secretary of War.

"From the foregoing it is admitted that the rent is properly payable from April 2, 1866, to October 10, 1866, but the Quartermaster's Department claims the right to deduct from such rent the amount voluntarily paid from April 9, 1865, to October 1, 1865.

"Your committee can see no just grounds upon which this deduction can be claimed or allowed, and find that the rent from April 2 to October 10, 1866, six months eight days, amounting to $2,506.66, is justly due to the claimant.

"The material and more difficult question is, whether rent from October 1, 1865, to April 2, 1866, can be properly allowed.

"The President, in pursuance of the act of Congress, approved July 13, 1861, did, by his proclamation of August 16, 1861, declare that the inhabitants of the State of Virginia, excepting the inhabitants of that part of Virginia lying west of the Alleghany Mountains, and of such other parts of that State as may maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and Constitution, or may be from time to time occupied and controlled by the United States forces, to be in a state of insurrection.

"By act of Congress, approved December 31, 1862, provision was made for the recognition of the State of West Virginia as a separate State in the Union, based upon the action of a convention assembled in Wheeling, November 26, 1861, and a general election held in pursuance of the action of said convention on May 3, 1862, and upon an act of the Legislature of Virginia, passed May 13, 1862, consenting to the formation of a new State within the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia, to be known as West Virginia.

"On the 9th day of May, 1865, the President, by executive order, declared the authority of the United States re-established in Virginia, and directed the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, the district judge of said district, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Interior to put in force all laws of the United States pertaining to their respective departments, and guaranteed to Francis H. Pierpont, governor of the State of Virginia, the aid of the Federal Government, as far as may be necessary, in all lawful measures for the extension and administration of the State government throughout the geographical limits of the State.

"On April 2, 1866, the President, by proclamation, declared that the insurrection in the States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Mississippi was at an end. The claimant, the Richmond Female Institute, as a body-politic or incorporation, did not participate in the rebellion, and although its property might be the lawful subject of seizure and occupation by the United States troops at the capture of Richmond, Virginia, by reason of its locality, yet this was a right which the Government could waive, and, as your committee think from the actions and proceedings of Generals Terry, Turner, and Schofield, did waive in this case, and had the rental value of the buildings duly determined, and voluntarily paid the rent up to October 1, 1865.

"In view of all the facts in this particular case, your committee think the claimant entitled to the rent from October 1, 1865, to October 10, 1866, amounting to $4,933 33, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill herewith reported. In addition to the foregoing there is another view of this particular case. It is this: by the law of nations institutions of learning are exempted by all civilized nations from the hostilities of war. They are to be classed, in this respect, with public libraries, hospitals, &c.

"Our Government in its 'instructions for the government of armies in the field,' originally prepared by Dr. Lieber, revised by a board of officers, of which Major-General Hitchcock was president, and approved by President Lincoln in 1863, binds itself by these rules, as follows: 'As a general rule, the property belonging to churches, to hospitals, or other establishments of an exclusively charitable character, to establishments of education or foundations for the promotion of knowledge, whether public schools, universities, academies of learning, or observatories, museums of the fine arts or of a scientific character, such property is not to be considered public property in the sense of paragraph thirty-one, but it may be taxed or used when the public service may require it.' See paragraph 34, General Orders No. 100, Adjutant General's Office, section 2.

"This order, in connection with the acts of the officers in charge of our armies in Richmond, clearly shows that the Government occupied the institution with the express understanding and intention of paying rent for same."

WARREN MITCHELL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of the Senate is the bill (S. No. 855) for the relief of Warren Mitchell; and the pending question is, shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time, upon which the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, my principal object in addressing the Senate to day upon this case is to try to eliminate it, if I can, from some of the irrelevant matter with which it has been surrounded. A great deal has been said in connection with it that really has no bearing whatever upon it. It involves in my judgment no question of politics, no question of party, no question calculated to excite the hostility of sections. It is a plain demand of an honest citizen upon his Government, which should be considered in a calm, deliberate, and impartial way. I was pained and astonished yesterday to hear the debate on this bill. I was pained to hear sectionalism brought into it, politics brought into it, great questions of public policy connected with it, when it really has nothing to do with any of them.

It was my fortune two years ago to make a report upon this case. I looked over the papers and I thought I had discovered in the facts presented to me an honest claim. I said so then. Nothing that has occurred since then has changed my opinion, and with a view of supporting the opinions that I then presented to the Senate in the short report that I made, I am here to-day to offer a few additional suggestions.

The first thing that I have always found it to be my duty to do in investigating matters of this kind, is to look at the facts. Sometimes lawyers put aside the facts. I have always thought it to be the best course to present them fully, and always presume that I am surrounded by those who have sufficient legal intelligence to apply the law to these facts.

Now, Mr. President, what are the facts of this case as we find them embodied in the report of the Committee on Claims, and about which there can be no dispute? We find first that Mr. Mitchell was a citizen of the State of Kentucky, and that in the early part of the war, about the 13th of July, 1861, I think, he made application to the officer in command of the military forces of the United States in that part of the country for a permit to enter the lines of the confederacy. I heard it said the other day, I think by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. McMILLAN,] who manifested a great deal of unnecessary feeling about this matter, if I am to judge from the way he discussed it, that the object of this man's mission to the confederacy was unknown.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator will permit me to correct him in that regard. I think I stated distinctly that at the time this pass was obtained it was stated that it was for the purpose of permitting the claimant to go South to collect debts due to firms of which he was a member.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I misapprehended the Senator.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir, but that did not appear in the pass.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The fact cannot be denied that the purpose of this man was made known at the time. He did not seek to enter the confederate lines in a stealthy way. He made no concealment as to the objects or purposes of his mission. He went to the functionary who above all others at that time represented the authority and the power of this Government, and laid his case before him, and in company with another citizen whose character has been vouched for by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREERY] it was stated, and very clearly stated, what the object and purpose of this man's mission was. He was in embarrassed circumstances; his creditors were pressing him; his whole fortune was invested in assets at the South. Civil war was upon the country. His loyalty was not disputed or questioned at that time; on the contrary, it was vouched for by Mr. McKnight, who was with him; and under all these circumstances, in July, 1861, the officer representing the power, the dignity, the authority of this Government said to the citizen, "I consent that you shall go into the confederacy for the purpose stated; I take the responsibility upon my shoulders in this matter." So declared a major-general representing, as I say, the power of this Government. Nothing was said as to the time it would take to arrange this business; no limitations were put upon the citizen in regard to the matter at all; but he was permitted to go to consummate his mission, to collect his debts, to withdraw his property as best he could from the beleagured section in order that he might satisfy his creditors at home. This fact cannot be denied.

He entered the confederacy in pursuance of that permission. Now, Mr. President, I need not tell you or the Senate that at that precise period of time no living man, no prophet, however wise, was able to foresee the direful events that lay behind; nobody was able to tell how long the fearful war which followed was going to last. Some imagined that it would be of three or four months' duration Others there were, I know, who supposed it would be a protracted and a fearful contest; but at the time Mr. Mitchell entered the lines of the confederacy, in July, 1861, there was a great division of opinion among the people of this country in regard to the character and probable duration of the struggle. I have no doubt that Mr. Mitchell supposed, as many honest citizens did, that it would be only a matter of a few months, and that he could enter the confederacy under the permission granted to him, settle up his business, and return home and satisfy his creditors. But, sir, after he entered the confederacy, things changed. Time added to the intensity and the fierceness of the struggle, and without knowing anything about the subject, I can very well understand how at that time it was much easier to enter the confederate lines in the way that he did than to get out of them in a similar manner.

But, sir, he went to work to accomplish the object of his mission. He collected all the debts that he could. He used the money in the purchase of cotton from persons who resided in the confederacy. He did not ship any of it out of the confederacy. He did not enter into the business of smuggling in violation of law, or any clandestine operation. Every dollar's worth of property that he purchased while there was kept within the confederate lines, and not one dollar's worth of it went out until it went out under the seal of Federal authority.

Mr. President, I am not unmindful of the character of the tribunal that I am addressing to-day. I am not here before a court which strains itself on tiptoe to measure the phraseology of a sentence in a statute. I am here before a body representing the sovereignty and the power of a great people. I am here before a body that has authority to set aside the law if the interests of justice or humanity demand it. I am not addressing myself to the creature of the statute. I am making no appeal to the Court of Claims, or to any other inferior tribunal, which has no power to move a step unless it finds it in the authority of the written law. I am here addressing myself to the great power of the Senate, representing in part the sovereignty of this Government, from which there is no appeal.

This question has been argued as though it was a question of law presented to a court of limited jurisdiction, bound down and tied down by the narrow and technical rules of jurisprudence. We are in no such body, sir, and this, I would say to my much esteemed friend from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] is not, in my judgment, the kind of case in which it can be said that the Supreme Court has made the law on the subject, as I understand him to assert. Sir, the Supreme Court, with all its great dignity and power, does not make the law for the Senate of the United States. It may expound and interpret the laws that we enact for its government and guidance, but it makes no laws for us. This is not a contest between individuals where when that court decides the case it cannot be interfered with except by a violation of private right. When the judicial tribunals of the country determine a question between man and man, that is the end of it; but where a court decides a question between the sovereign and the citizen, between the government and a subject, it is not necessarily the end of it. That citizen has a right to appeal to the magnanimity of his government; that citizen has a right to appeal to the justice of his sovereign and say to him, as this citizen says to-day, "You must not take advantage of this judgment." Such an appeal to a private party we know from our knowledge of human selfishness would be vain; but when the address is made to the great sovereign power of a great country, it is always listened to, and sometimes with effect. The records of Congress show numerous cases in which this power has been invoked. How often has Congress said where a judgment was rendered against a surety on an official bond that he should be exonerated from the payment of the penalty that the court had no power to relieve him of? I think I remember a case that came up here a year or two ago from the State of my distinguished friend from Georgia wherein this very power was invoked, and invoked successfully, to set aside a judgment obtained by the Government against a surety on an official bond and to do that justice which it was not in the power of the local tribunal to do. This is a familiar and ordinary exercise of jurisdiction on the part of the sovereign power. I would therefore say that that argument which undertakes to prove that because the Supreme Court, following the letter of the law, denied this man the relief which he sought we ought not to look beyond the head-notes of the decision, ought not for a moment to be considered.

Mr. MORGAN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask him whether it is not true in almost every Southern State that the decisions of their supreme courts establish the doctrine that dealings between citizens of the Confederate States and of the loyal States during the war were void, and that there could be no recovery for the value of property thus contracted for?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not know what the adjudications of the supreme court of the State of Alabama may have been on that subject, for I never looked into them. They may go to the extent stated by the Senator, and no doubt they do, and I certainly know they do if he says so; but I know of no such decision in my State.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the Senator that the decisions in the Southern States are very numerous on that point, and many contracts have been avoided by the judgments of the supreme courts of the Southern States on the ground that the property had been brought from the loyal States contrary to the laws of intercourse between the loyal and disloyal States, and men have been discharged from those obligations.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In contests between individuals?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Well, I will show a little different law from that before I get through, and with all due deference to the judgment of those courts I might be disposed to differ with them, for after all it is a question of reason, and the Senate of the United States, anxious to do what is right and proper, will try to find out which is the better reason. I have in my hand a decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts, which, from the manner it has gone into this question, shows that it left nothing untouched—one of the most enlightened judgments, I think, that I have ever read on this subject, wherein the contrary doctrine is clearly and emphatically announced. I am glad that it has come from that quarter. I am glad to be able to say in my place here that in advocating this demand I can stand upon a Massachusetts decision, one that does credit to that grand old Commonwealth and to the men who preside over her tribunals of justice. It shows me one thing, Mr. President, that in the highest judicial seats of that State the rancor and the bitterness of politics have not entered; and when they permitted a citizen of the State of Mississippi to go into their local courts and sue a citizen of Massachusetts on a deed for land made in the State of Mississippi during the war and recover a judgment against him with this very defense interposed, it presents to my mind the highest evidence of judicial impartiality. Here it is. Here is the case of Kershaw vs. Kelsey, decided as late as 1868, after a full review of this whole doctrine. After listening to every argument that could be interposed against the right of the Mississippi citizen to recover upon the ground that the contract violated public policy, this learned court went into an examination of this doctrine from the time that it first received judicial sanction in England under Sir William Scott, that great civil jurist, down to the present day, and they held that a leasing of land and a contract with respect to cotton and corn entered into in the State of Mississippi between a citizen of that Commonwealth and a citizen of Massachusetts who maintained his allegiance to the Government of the United States, even after the commencement of the war, was not in violation of any law or public policy of this country, and they held that he was entitled to recover, and gave him a judgment for over $5,000 against the loyal citizen of Massachusetts in her own courts, although the plaintiff had adhered to the confederacy during the whole period of the civil war. I say, sir, it is the finest commentary that could be made upon the intelligence and impartiality of that tribunal.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator from Florida give us a reference to the book?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly. It is the case of Kershaw vs. Kelsey, reported in 100 Massachusetts Reports, page 501. No man who reads the opinion of that enlightened tribunal, no lawyer at least, can put down the book without having firmly fixed one conclusion in his mind, and that is, that all that was said here yesterday in regard to the subject of non-intercourse has properly no application to this case, and inasmuch as this great tribunal is not bound by any law, but must speak for the better reason, it is at liberty to take any decision which in its judgment throws the most light upon this most important and intricate subject.

In looking over the judgment of our own Supreme Court in this very case, I was astonished to find a cause treated in the manner in which it was, and I could not help contrasting it with the manner in which this painstaking court in Massachusetts dealt with this great question. Why, sir, the latter decided that it is not every trading or every dealing on the part of a citizen of a loyal State with a citizen of a disloyal one that will work a violation of the law of non-intercourse. They go on to show in as clear a manner as possible that what the law meant when it said that no intercourse should take place between the citizens of the loyal and disloyal States was that no external commerce should be carried on; that no transfers of properties or credits from one section or one State to another should take place during the existence of hostilities, which might have the effect to build up and to increase the power of the opposite belligerent; but they went on to say that any dealings purely internal within the body of the community, between citizens even of the hostile sections, could not be reprehended either in morals or in law. That is the true distinction; and they go on to show that, notwithstanding all the dicta and all the very unsatisfactory opinions that have been given for the last hundred years on this subject, the true doctrine is, so far as the law of nations is concerned, and our statute follows it, that it only means to interdict commercial intercourse between the citizens and people of two distinct sections or nations that are at war.

Here was a purchase, then, which no one will pretend to say carried with it any exportation. There was no transfer of property from the confederate to the Federal lines, except what was carried on by the Federal authorities after they came into possession of this man's goods. He did not send a bale of cotton outside of the confederacy; he did not send a pound of bacon outside of it. Everything that he did was done within the confederate lines, and was purely internal, and was the product of his own credits that were invested in that section before he had come there.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the decision of Kershaw vs. Kelsey, which is a very lengthy one, but there are certain points in it which the Senator ought to be able to explain. He asserts that this is the authority of the supreme court of Massachusetts on his side of this proposition. The first point in it to which I ask his attention is the statement that—

> It does not appear whether the defendant went into Mississippi before or after the beginning of the war of the rebellion; and there is no evidence of any intent on the part of either party to violate or evade the laws, or oppose or injure the Government of the United States.

Again:

> No answer in the nature of a plea of alien enemy has been filed in this case, and no objection made to the capacity of the plaintiff to sue, but only to the validity of the contract sued on; and therefore no question of the personal disability of the plaintiff is involved or need be considered, except so far as to show that it is wholly independent of the merits of the cause of action.

Again——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will give all the time anybody wants after he reads that decision for him to explain it. I have read it, and the Senator I think will concur with me after he reads it fully, when I say that those points he mentions are utterly immaterial, and the court treats them as immaterial. It was no matter whether the defendant went there before or after the commencement of hostilities for the purposes of the reasoning of that case.

Mr. MORGAN. At all events, the supreme court of Massachusetts, after stating the issues in the cause, and after stating that the questions which I understand the Senator to be now arguing were not involved in those issues, proceeds to declare that the various decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States were obiter dicta. In an obiter of the supreme court of Massachusetts they overhaul and declare obiter various decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Well, sir, the decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts I am anxious shall speak for itself, without any comment; and in addressing itself to the mind of the country, it will explain itself fully.

Mr. DAWES. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Florida, and will not do so if it will embarrass him at all; but it does seem to me that he is entirely mistaken in the decision he cites. I have not read it for a good while, but I have understood it to be that there was upon the record an entire absence of any element that distinguished the case from an ordinary contract that might have existed whether there was war or not, though there was an effort to impart to the case that character after the pleadings were completed. I am not certain about it, but that is my impression.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not know about that, but I know this: I know that in no decision that has been made in recent days has this subject been more thoroughly examined; and, without being able to say what the condition of the pleadings was, the court have gone into this subject; they have reviewed all the cases that were decided before, and inasmuch as the decision has been referred to, I will read one or two extracts:

> The result is, that the law of nations, as judicially declared, prohibits all intercourse between citizens of the two belligerents which is inconsistent with a state of war between their countries; and that this includes any act of voluntary submission to the enemy, or receiving his protection; as well any act or contract which tends to increase his resources; and every kind of trading or commercial dealing or intercourse, whether by transmission of money or goods, or orders for the delivery of either, between the two countries, directly or indirectly, through the intervention of third persons or partnerships, or by contracts in any form looking to or involving such transmission, or by insurances upon trade with or by the enemy. Beyond the principle of these cases the prohibition has not been carried by judicial decision. The more sweeping statements in the text-books are taken from the dicta which we have already examined, and in none of them is any other example given than those just mentioned. At this age of the world, when all the tendencies of the law of nations are to exempt individuals and private contracts from injury or restraint in consequence of war between their governments, we are not disposed to declare such contracts unlawful as have not been heretofore adjudged to be inconsistent with a state of war.
> The trading or transmission of property or money which is prohibited by international law is from or to one of the countries at war.

What does that mean? Let me read it again:

> The trading or transmission of property or money which is prohibited by international law is from or to one of the countries at war. An alien enemy residing in this country may contract and sue like a citizen. (2 Kent Com., 63.)

That is, a citizen of a country at war with the United States may contract and sue like a citizen.

> When a creditor, although a subject of the enemy, remains in the country of the debtor, or has a known agent there authorized to receive the amount of the debt, throughout the war, payment there to such creditor or his agent can in no respect be construed into a violation of the duties imposed by a state of war upon the debtor; it is not made to an enemy, in contemplation of international or municipal law; and it is no objection that the agent may possibly remit the money to his principal in the enemy's country; if he should do so, the offense would be imputable to him.

Now, sir, we have an inquiry here about reason, about what is right, and I am as anxious that we arrive at a correct conclusion as any man——

Mr. MORGAN. I would ask the Senator from Florida whether the Supreme Court of the United States have not decided this particular issue between Warren Mitchell and the United States, and decided upon the facts presented to that court that Warren Mitchell because of his violation of the non-intercourse laws had acquired no right to this property; and if that be the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, does the Senator expect the Senate of the United States to reverse that decision?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will answer the Senator, because I intended to come to that after a while if he would only let me alone, for I know that that is the whole basis of the argument.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg the Senator to excuse me.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly, and I will yield every time the Senator wishes me to do so.

Now, I say, and say very candidly, that the decision of the Supreme Court on this subject is a very unsatisfactory one. I do not think it has gone into the question at all. It affirmed the judgment of the Court of Claims, and it speaks of the domicile of Mitchell as being in Kentucky, and I infer from its conclusion—because I stated so in my report in 1877 in this very case, which I have in my hand—that the decision of the Supreme Court was that on a sheer technicality it concluded that man was not entitled to relief.

Mr. MITCHELL. With the Senator's permission I will say a word. I agree with very much that the Senator from Florida has said in regard to this case, but I submit to him if the court in Massachusetts did not distinctly state, so far as that case was concerned, that in the absence of any question being raised as to the capacity of the party to sue, they would hold the contract valid, thereby plainly indicating that if the question had been raised as to the capacity of the party to sue they would not have sustained the case.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not take that view of it, because they have gone into the whole question and decided it upon its merits, and said that the leasing of a plantation by a citizen of the State of Mississippi to a citizen of the State of Massachusetts in time of war and a contract which stipulated for the delivery and payment of corn for the use of it violated no law or public policy of the United States.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator has referred to the fact that at a former session of Congress he examined this case and made a report upon it. I desire to ask the Senator whether he applies the case in Massachusetts to the facts as he found them to exist at that time, or if he applies that authority to the facts as they are reported in this case at this time?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do, emphatically; and I say that there is nothing in the facts of this case to take it out of the principle laid down by the Massachusetts court.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator says he does emphatically, but my question was in the alternative and I would like to know to which of the alternatives the Senator applies his answer—whether he applies the decision in Massachusetts to the case as reported by him or to the case as reported by the committee at this time.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I apply it to the case as reported by myself, and I do not know that the facts are materially different. I have never heard from any of the debates here that there was any great difference in the facts reported by me.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to ask the Senator if at the time he made his report it appeared that the claimant here had taken charge of and exercised supervision over a contract between his partner and the confederate government to supply that government with pork?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I have never yet been satisfied that that was a fact. I understood that the claimant, Mr. Mitchell, in the affidavit attached to his petition disclaims it, and that has been one of the disputed questions.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if at the time he made his report that question was raised in the committee at all?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It was not, I am free to say.

Mr. McMILLAN. So I thought.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It was a matter that was afterward brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Since then I have not looked into that matter very fully. I have glanced over the affidavit made by Mr. Mitchell himself, in which I understand he states that he had no connection with the contract entered into by the man who was employed by the government of the confederacy, and that he put it at an end as soon as he discovered it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does the Senator not understand Mr. Mitchell himself to testify that he did participate in the performance of that contract, for the term of six weeks?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think that Mr. Mitchell states the fact that he assisted in the slaughtering of meat that was to be delivered to the confederate government under a contract made with another party of which he had no notice or knowledge.

Mr. MITCHELL. He does not state that even. He states that the confederate government had a contract with John Doe made in his absence and without his knowledge, that John Doe made a subcontract with Richard Roe without his knowledge and in his absence, and that this Richard Roe, the third man, without his knowledge and in his absence made a contract with his partner. Those are the facts.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Senator from Oregon is more familiar with the subject than I am, and I take that as an answer to the question of the Senator from Minnesota.

In regard to what the Senator from Alabama said a while ago I was about to give an answer, but I was interrupted by the Senator from Minnesota, and it brought about rather a confusion of ideas in regard to the matter, but I will try to answer the Senator from Alabama as to the decision in Warren Mitchell's case.

I tried to state to the Senate when I opened this discussion to-day, that I did not consider it to be the function or the province of the Supreme Court to make law for the Senate. I said that in any case which arises between the Government and the citizen the Government represented here in this sovereign body has a right in the exercise of discretion to avail itself or not of a judgment that may have been rendered in its favor by one of its own courts. I say that this power has been exercised, since the commencement of the Government, and it will be exercised as long as the Government shall live; and the Senator's reasoning, however applicable it may be to controversies between parties with which the Government has nothing to do except to see that the judgments in all cases of that kind are carried out, has no application in reason or in law or in morals to a controversy where a citizen of the country is on the one side and the United States of America is on the other.

I say, sir, that this power has been repeatedly exercised, as in the case of sureties that I have instanced. When the party can have no relief at law, when the equity of his case is so strong as to strike the conscience of the people, he makes appeal to the Government, and very frequently it has granted him relief. The only question we have here to-day is whether we have that kind of a case before us.

The Senator says the decision of the Supreme Court is conclusive and shuts out all inquiry. I deny it. I say that we are at perfect liberty in dealing with this question to inquire into the reasonableness of this man's claim, and if we can find in the judgment of the supreme court of Massachusetts more solid reasons for allowing it than we can find in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States for denying it, we ought to accept the doctrine of the former. Now I say in regard to that judgment that under the law of nations, which our statute merely follows, it is not unlawful or illegal for a citizen of a country at war to make a contract within the limits of the country with which his own is at war that has no relation to commercial intercourse, that has not for its object commercial intercourse, and that is not in its effects and tendencies calculated to promote and to advance the strength and the interest of the party at war. That is the ground.

Sir, so particular was the Government of the United States on this subject that it was not willing that the question should remain to be decided according to the unsettled and unsatisfactory judgment of the courts of law. The Congress of the United States was not willing that this question should be determined by the dicta of Sir William Scott, or Chancellor Kent, or any other of the great jurists who had passed upon it. They, in other words, were not willing that the people of this country should be driven to the musty libraries of counsel or of judges to ascertain what the law on this subject was, but in the very commencement of the late civil war Congress enacted a statute to show the people of the country what their views of this matter were, and I will say to the Senate that that statute followed precisely the language of the Massachusetts case, and the Massachusetts case refers to this statute of the United States in regard to the subject of non-intercourse. What is it?

SEC. 5301. Whenever the President, in pursuance of the provisions of this title, has called forth the militia to suppress combinations against the laws of the United States, and to cause the laws to be duly executed, and the insurgents shall have failed to disperse by the time directed by the President, and when the insurgents claim to act under the authority of any State or States, and such claim is not disclaimed or repudiated by the persons exercising the functions of government in such State or States, or in the part or parts thereof in which such combination exists, and such insurrection is not suppressed by such State or States, or whenever the inhabitants of any State or part thereof are at any time found by the President to be in insurrection against the United States, the President may, by proclamation, declare that the inhabitants of such State, or of any section or part thereof where such insurrection exists, are in a state of insurrection against the United States; and thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof and the citizens of the rest of the United States shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue; and all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise, coming from such State or section into the other parts of the United States, or proceeding from other parts of the United States to such State or section, by land or water, shall, together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same, or conveying persons to or from such State or section, be forfeited to the United States.

That is the law of this country on the subject of non-intercourse. It did not leave it, I say, to the judgment of Sir William Scott or Chancellor Kent or any of the other great jurists who had been disputing over this question for the last one hundred or more years, but it took the precaution to put down in precise and marked language what should constitute a violation of the law of nations in the late civil struggle; that is, commercial intercourse between a State in rebellion or insurrection, as it was called, and the States adhering to the Union. That is the doctrine, and the decision in Massachusetts adopts this language and says most emphatically that there is nothing in it inconsistent with the views that it has expressed, and it holds emphatically to the doctrine that every contract by parties whose countries may be at war is not necessarily in violation of public policy or the law of nations. Why, sir, you remember the great case of Martin vs. Hunter, reported in first Wheaton, where the Supreme Court of the United States, following the judgment of the court of appeals of Virginia, decided that an alien in the midst of the revolutionary war could acquire a title by purchase to real estate in the State of Virginia. Why was that? He could not inherit it, because according to the common law an alien has no inheritable blood; but he could acquire by purchase or by grant, and the great principle decided in Martin vs. Hunter, one of the grandest judgments on the records of our courts, was that an alien enemy in the midst of the revolutionary war could acquire title to a large portion of the domain of Virginia in the midst of that terrible struggle, and the title was maintained. Why was that? Plainly because it involved no commercial intercourse, because there was no question of the transmission of credits or of money or of property from the one country to the other involved in it. The land lay in Virginia, and the passing of the title to the British alien did not affect at all the struggling patriots who were fighting in the cause of liberty, and the title was maintained. Now, sir, the purchase by Mitchell of this cotton did not affect in any way the government of the confederacy. It did not strengthen them in the least, any more than the purchase of the land in Virginia strengthened the British government when it was engaged in its contest with the colonies. There was no transmissions of assets contemplated, no transportation provided for. It was the intention and the desire of the party to hold the cotton until the end of the war, and then to avail himself of it for the purpose stated, of discharging his honest debts.

So much, sir, in regard to the laws of war upon the subject of commercial intercourse. I heard it stated in the debate here yesterday that according to the laws of war the private property of subjects or citizens of belligerent powers is liable to capture and to appropriation and to confiscation. I concede most emphatically that it is in the power of a party who has the advantage of the battle-field to do anything he pleases. There is nothing to guide him but that great moral and natural force that comes from on high. But if there is anything better settled in international jurisprudence than another; if there is anything that has received more than another the almost universal sanction of every writer who is worthy of the name that has penned a line on the subject of jurisprudence as it concerns the nations of the earth, it is that the private property on land of citizens of countries engaged in war is not liable to capture. I know that there is an exception in the case of property on the sea; and if the reason of that exception was open now, if we were sitting here now in a council of nations to decide whether there ought to be an exception in the case of property on the sea, I am sure there would not be found an intelligent man in the land who would say that exception ought to prevail. No, sir; it is not the doctrine of the law of nations; but, on the contrary, it is the universal principle that the private property of citizens and non-combatants in war is not subject to capture, and it is to be regretted that the binding force of that great code has not been more fully carried out.

Why, sir, we have numerous examples of this. The best dispatches that Wellington ever wrote, the best productions that ever came from his pen, were on this subject; and our own commanding general, Scott, in the invasion of Mexico, as we know, took great pains to have this great principle observed, but was not always able to do it. The doctrine was that his army should pay for what it took in the captured country, and that the property and rights of the people were not absolutely at the command of every military officer or his soldiery.

Now, what does the statute that I read a while ago tell you? Does it not tell you that all property which is found passing from one part of the country to the other in time of war should be subject to forfeiture? It goes no further than that. It says nothing about the internal transactions of citizens, but it subjects to forfeiture all property found passing between the sections at war, and that is as far as the Government in the exercise of its rigid powers at that time felt disposed to go. This property was captured not in transitu, not in passing from Georgia to New York, not on the public highway of transportation, but it was carried to and stored in Savannah and was there in the possession of its rightful owner, the man who had devoted years of toil and exertion to acquire it. It was not in any sense abandoned property; it was not in my judgment in any sense captured property, because the capture of a country by the forces of another at war does not carry with it the transfer of the private rights of individuals. It is a well-established principle of the law of nations that even the most successful conqueror, when he succeeds by the force of arms in putting down his adversary, succeeds to nothing more than the sovereign powers of government; he succeeds only to the great prerogative of dealing out to them the principles of human justice and seeing to the preservation of order. That is all. This cotton was not the property of the Confederate States; this cotton was not in military custody; this cotton never contributed in any way toward the aid of the confederacy. It was in every respect in which the question can be regarded private property of a citizen, and, according to the decision of the Supreme Court in this very case, a loyal citizen of the country, and taken from his possession by the hand of the successful military commander who obtained possession of the town.

Tell me not, sir, that this is a legitimate war capture. Not at all. The Supreme Court in a number of cases now upon the record have held that money arising from the sale of cotton like this is a trust fund. They have said it. They have said in many cases, I think, that they were unable to dispose of it, owing to the state of the law; but they have held it to be a trust fund. I listened with delight and pleasure the other day to the distinguished Senator from New York not now in his seat, [Mr. CONKLING,] when he gave us a description of a trust fund in discussing the Indian question, and wherever there is a trust, says he, it involves a confidence and an assent of honor that places it beyond the power of the trustee to touch; and so it is in this case. The proceeds of this man's property did not come from taxation; they did not come from any source but from the sale of his own goods; and when he made application for its return he was told that a technical difficulty was in the way, and he could not be permitted to get it.

My friend from Georgia [Mr. HILL] yesterday, in speaking of this case, compared it to some extent with a case that arises out of the unauthorized raid, so to speak, of the soldiery on the march. Now, sir, if there is anything clearer than another, it is the distinction that must always exist in cases of this kind between what is done or has been done by the unauthorized soldier on the march not acting under the control of or in subordination to his officers, and what is done by the responsible representatives of the Government dealing with the property of the citizen and transferring its proceeds into the public Treasury. If there is any analogy between those two cases, I cannot see it. It may be owing to my want of perception.

Take an army on the march: they plunder and they burn and they raid and make inroads upon private rights such as are inseparable from hostilities in a country. Nobody pretends to say that such transactions as those would furnish any ground of demand against the Government to which such forces belong. But take the case of a responsible officer acting under the authority, it may be the express wishes, of his Government, who seizes my estate and transfers the proceeds of it into the public Treasury, and then undertake to settle the one case by the principles applicable to the other. That is not reason; it is not law; it is not justice.

Why, sir, the other day those people whom we have been in the habit of talking so severely about, that hold dominion over the island of Cuba, succeeded in putting down the rebellion in that island. They succeeded after a long and weary struggle, I believe, in disarming the few noble men who resisted oppression and despotism on that fairest of American isles. And what did they do? Notwithstanding all that we have heard about Spanish cruelty and injustice, after they had issued a pardon and amnesty to the insurgents of that island they restored to every man his estate. It is a wellknown fact that the estates of numbers of the people in arms were embargoed; the estates of numbers of them who were supposed to be in sympathy with that contest had been seized pending the struggle; but when they pardoned them they conceded full restoration of liberty and property. They did not deal out a half measure. They gave it all up. They said, "We seized your estates in the midst of hostilities to prevent it being used against our power; but now the war is over, now the contest is ended; we have told you that we would give you back your estate; we give it to you." This is all that Warren Mitchell asks, to put his case in the worst possible condition, even if he is to be treated as a disloyal citizen, which is the most I have heard said against him from the other side. You have pardoned him, and you have said in that pardon that he shall be entitled to full restoration of the rights of property, and still after that pardon is granted and with $100,000 or more of his estate locked up in the Treasury, which he acquired by his honest exertions, you tell him that the pardon can have no application, and some gentlemen get up here and say that the Supreme Court has decided so! Oh, no. I wish the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases of this kind were more fully regarded. The Supreme Court has decided that when you pardon a man you must restore to him his property. There is the decision; I have not time to read it, but it is founded in honesty as well as in law; and this man, notwithstanding what has been said, was accorded full pardon for everything that he did. If his crime were that of purchasing cotton, then he was pardoned and placed upon the footing of the most favored citizen.

Mr. President, I had no idea of detaining the Senate this long, but the interest of the questions involved has carried me farther than I intended.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, as I have to cast my vote on the pending measure I deem it best to state very briefly the reasons which will govern me in doing so. The bill under consideration does not present a claim against the Government in the sense in which a claim is popularly understood. It does not seek an appropriation of any money from the Treasury which is a part of the public revenue or which has been placed there by taxation of the people. If it becomes a law the people whom I represent will not have a dollar of the amount involved to pay, nor will the constituents of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] nor the constituents of any other Senator on this floor. The simple question here is whether the money taken from Mr. Mitchell shall be returned to him or be retained by the Government. It stands on the books of the Treasury, not as public funds in the Treasury, but stands to the account of cotton belonging to Mr. Mitchell, which was seized and sold by the United States authorities. If it is returned he will receive the proceeds of what no one disputes was his own property, honestly bought and paid for; nor will its return add a single cent to the burden of the tax-payer, while its retention by the Government will take from him the entire fruits of a long and industrious life-time. The policy of confiscation was long ago abandoned in the dealings of the Government with those most active and conspicuous in the rebellion.

Is there anything in this case calling upon us to confiscate the entire estate of Warren Mitchell? That is the question. What are the facts in the premises demanding the forfeiture of all his property to the Government when such a course has long since been abandoned toward all others? I understand from the papers on file that Warren Mitchell was an extensive business man at Louisville, Kentucky, when the war broke out in 1861; that he was indebted to creditors living in loyal States, and had large sums due and owing to him in the seceding States. Under these circumstances he applied to General Anderson of the Federal Army for permission to go South for the purpose of collecting his debts in that section. This permission was granted, and General Anderson received no rebuke from the Government for his action in the case. I think it a poor plea now to urge that General Anderson's act was unauthorized in order that we may keep Mr. Mitchell's money. If it was unauthorized it should have been so held at the time. In fact I do not believe that General Anderson's act was unauthorized. I do not believe that any officer of his position and character would at that time have passed a citizen through his lines into the lines of the enemy without the sanction of those above him. Such permission was rarely given, and only in cases where it was thought that the cause of the Union would be benefited by doing so. In this instance Mr. Mitchell's motive was a friendly one to the people of the loyal States, and was fully understood by General Anderson.

Mr. Mitchell did not go South to aid the enemy. He did not go there to join their warlike ranks. He was not on a hostile mission. His mission was one of peace and for the benefit of his creditors living in the States attached to the Union. Others were in several instances allowed to do the same during the war. In the prosecution of this purpose Mr. Mitchell, after much delay and many vicissitudes, secured between seven and eight hundred bales of cotton. It was seized near the close of the war, sold, and the proceeds placed in the Treasury, as I have described.

It will be seen from these facts that this cotton was not bought or accumulated at Savannah "in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States," to quote the clause of the constitutional amendment. It was not to be used to assist the enemies of the Government, but the very reverse; nor were the motives or efforts of Mr. Mitchell in obtaining it those of disloyalty.

By section 5308 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that property to be liable to confiscation must have been purchased "with intent to use or employ the same, or to suffer the same to be used or employed in aiding, abetting, or promoting such insurrection." There is no pretense of such an intent here. On the contrary, it is clearly shown that he purchased the cotton with the intention of sending it to a loyal State for the purpose of paying his debts to loyal creditors. Neither was this cotton destroyed by the operations of the Army in the prosecution of the war, nor was it taken to afford supplies for our troops. Its seizure grew out of no military requirement whatever. The return of the proceeds of its sale, therefore, to its acknowledged owner is not forbidden by the letter or the spirit of the Constitution or any of its amendments.

It is insisted, however, that the conduct of Mr. Mitchell while in the South was such as to justify us in confiscating or declaring forfeited to the Government everything he has in the world. It appears from the papers in the case that his partner, Mr. Armstrong, now dead, became interested in a slaughter-house at Clarksville, Tennessee. This was at first without the knowledge or consent of Mr. Mitchell, but he afterward for the space of about six weeks assisted in the management of the establishment. If this one act is sufficient to warrant us in withholding the proceeds of all his property while we have reinstated everybody else in the enjoyment of all their possessions, except slaves, then this bill must fail. A careful examination of the facts in this case, however, has convinced me that Warren Mitchell was a Union man, one of that class of conservative business men living in a border State, doing business with the people of both sections, and attached to his Government from motives of interest as well as sentiments of patriotism. Nor do I think there is anything in his motives or his conduct in going South, or while there, calling on us to visit him with such a tremendous penalty as the opponents of this bill desire to inflict upon him, a penalty which has been spared to the promoters, the leaders, and the chieftains of the late rebellion.

The law of this case has been stated by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] The Supreme Court of the United States simply found that Warren Mitchell never having changed his residence from a loyal State to a disloyal one, being still a citizen of Kentucky and intending to return there after transacting his business in the South, could not, under the laws of war, make a contract with a citizen of a seceding State during hostilities which the courts of this Government would recognize. That is all there is of the decision, and it in no way touches or attempts to touch the merits of this case except in so far as it establishes the fact that Mr. Mitchell did not change his residence or intend to do so, and that is a circumstance favorable to his loyalty to the Government.

In former decisions, however, the Supreme Court of the United States has broadly and plainly declared the law to be that if Warren Mitchell had in fact removed from Kentucky and acquired a home in Georgia or any other seceding State; had thereupon cast in his fortunes with the southern confederacy, been elected to the confederate congress, or led its armed forces in the field, his property or its proceeds would have been restored to him without question.

In Pargoud, vs. U. S., 13 Wallace, 157, the words of the Supreme Court are as follows:

> We have recently decided in the case of Armstrong vs. U. S., 13 Wall., 154, that the President's proclamation of December 25, 1868, (15 Stats., 711,) granting pardon and amnesty unconditionally and without reservation to all who participated, directly or indirectly, in the late rebellion, relieves the claimants of captured and abandoned property from proof of adhesion to the United States during the late civil war. It was unnecessary, therefore, to prove such adhesion or personal pardon for taking part in the rebellion against the United States. The judgment of the Court of Claims dismissing the petition is reversed.

The same position is taken in several other cases, but it is not necessary to cite them as the point under consideration is not even disputed. The law of this case, as I stated, has not been disputed and will not be by a single member of this body on this floor. With it, therefore, as the admitted law of the land that Mr. Mitchell would have his property returned to him if he had been a more unfaithful citizen than he in fact was; that he would have a legal right to the relief prayed for in this bill if he had been the president of the southern confederacy, or a senator or member in its legislative councils, or a soldier in its armies, I cannot for the life of me see either justice or sound policy in treating him with a severity unknown in all other cases.

Sir, I have aimed to determine my duty in regard to this case as I shall every other that comes before this body. The section from which a claim comes, whether from Massachusetts or Mississippi, whether from Vermont or South Carolina, should not decide its fate. Is it just? Do the facts and the law demand its allowance? These are the sole questions to be answered, and they must be answered by each individual case on its own merits or demerits. This case is answered on its merits to my mind, and it ought to be allowed, and I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] in citing a decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts as applicable to this case, stated, in response to my inquiry to him, that he applied that decision to the facts of the case as they are stated in a former report made by him as a member of the Committee on Claims and not to the facts as they are found to exist now and reported to the Senate by the report under consideration. At the time of the report made by the Senator from Florida it was not known that Mr. Warren Mitchell had committed any of the acts which are of a treasonable character, as I view them, stated in this report. It was the mere naked question of this cotton being found in Savannah acquired by him, sold by the Government of the United States after the capture by General Sherman, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The case as presented now is wholly different from that. The facts here show that Mr. Mitchell proceeded to the South within the confederate lines early in the summer of 1861, avowedly for the purpose of collecting debts due to the firms of which he was a member. He remained there during the whole war, passing from one State to another, purchasing cotton in different places, not transporting it from the place it was purchased directly to Savannah but purchasing in one place and selling in another; proceeding year after year in this way during the war until he arrived near Savannah and had there a large investment of money in cotton, and had it at last transported there, or he may have purchased the cotton himself in Savannah, it does not appear distinctly which. A portion of it was transported to Savannah, and in the course of the transportation of this cotton Mr. Mitchell entered into contracts for the transportation of it, and with corporations within the confederate lines and with persons who were engaged in running and controlling the railroads in the confederacy.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Minnesota permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to know how the trading operations of Mr. Mitchell within the limits of the Confederate States, and having no reference to commerce with other people and other nations, could have added to his guilt or in any manner have embarrassed or injured the Government of the United States?

Mr. MCMILLAN. A sufficient answer to that question is that these acts were prohibited by law, according to the decision of the highest tribunal in the land. But permit me further to say to the Senator from Tennessee that Mr. Mitchell must have liquidated the debts due to him from citizens of the confederacy. He received either in money or in cotton the payment of those debts, and according to his own statement, with the proceeds of that indebtedness, in money no doubt and in cotton, he proceeds to enter into the ordinary and common purchase from time to time, in different places, of cotton which is contraband of war. Whether he remained within the lines of the confederacy or not, he was a citizen of a loyal State, claiming to be loyal to the Government of the United States, and within the lines of the confederacy engaged in commercial pursuits, giving circulation to their funds, converting their cotton into money, enabling them by these facilities to carry on the operations of the war; because, who can doubt that the transaction of commerce within the lines of the confederacy aided them in carrying on the war? Suppose there had been no commercial transactions in the Confederate States during that time; suppose the business, the commerce of the Confederate States had been destroyed entirely, would not that have affected their capacity to carry on the war? If a loyal citizen goes within their lines, establishes a commercial business, enters into commercial transactions, exchanging commodities, giving cash or cotton for cotton in exchange, can it be said that this is not commercial intercourse? Can it be said that this is not rendering aid and comfort to that confederacy?

It is said that because the citizens of the southern confederacy would not forfeit their title to property acquired in such commercial transactions, therefore Mr. Mitchell, a citizen of a northern State, who did not commit so great a crime against the country as those who were in rebellion did, should not have less rights or favor at the hand of the Government. The case between a citizen of a loyal State who is a traitor going over to the enemies of his country and aiding them in fighting their battles against the country is worse than that of those who were recognized as belligerents, because they were recognized as enemies under the law of nations, and we knew what we had to meet when we fought against them; but when men who were our own citizens, who told us that they loved this country, that they rendered their allegiance to it, proved traitors to us and went to the confederacy and secretly aided them, they were the persons who injured us worse than the confederates themselves; and it was from such persons that our severe injuries came.

Mr. Mitchell does not stand in the position here of a fair and honorable enemy of the country, but as a professed friend abusing the confidence of the Government and aiding an enemy. That is the reason why he could not acquire a title to this property. That is the reason why he does not stand here in a position to receive the favor of the Government. That is the reason why a citizen of this Government cannot acquire a legal right in a transaction such as he participated in in this case.

It is claimed by the Senator from Florida that a general pardon having been issued to Mr. Mitchell he is restored to all his rights of property under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is true that the Supreme Court of the United States made the decision referred to by the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] who has just taken his seat; but that decision is not applicable to this case, because Mr. Mitchell acquired no property in this cotton. He had no property to be restored by a pardon. No title passed to him in this cotton, as the Supreme Court of the United States have decided. He never had any property in it, and the pardon restored no title or conferred none upon him. That decision is not at all applicable. I have not been able to read the entire decision cited by the Senator from Florida in the case in Massachusetts.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Minnesota permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask the Senator if the evidence in this case does not show that the cotton was in the possession of Mr. Mitchell when it was seized?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is not that the fact?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No, sir, not as I understand it. The cotton was with a large quantity of cotton stored in the city of Savannah, and was seized with all the cotton seized by General Sherman in that city. It was sold as a part of the entire cotton seized by General Sherman, and the expense of the sale, the expense of the conversion of that cotton into money, is not even deducted from Mr. Mitchell's claim. According to the reports from the Secretary of the Treasury, even if this claim were to be allowed, the expense of the Government apportioned to this cotton amounts to more than $12,000.

The case in Massachusetts, as I understand it, goes only to this extent, conceding for the purposes of this argument the correctness of the decision, that all contracts made by citizens of one country with the citizens of another at war with it are not void. But that was the case of a single contract for a piece of land, and therefore did not come within the prohibition of commerce. That is the principle decided in the case cited by the Senator from Florida, and nothing more. This is not such a case. Here is no contract. This is not a suit between two citizens for the enforcement of a contract, or the recovery of any proceeds from such contract. This is a claim presented by a citizen against the Government of the United States, and it appears that in the acquisition of that property the claimant was engaged in the transaction of ordinary commercial business in the hostile country.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the chairman of the Committee on Claims allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEREFORD. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question of law, whether the General Government acquired any title to this property?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Government seized this property as prize of war, and acquired the title to it conferred by that act.

Mr. HEREFORD. Were there any proceedings to confiscate this property?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No, sir.

Mr. HEREFORD. Then, if it belonged to the General Government, why did they not keep the money in the Treasury of the United States, and why put it among the proceeds of captured property?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HEREFORD. But it is a separate fund, a trust fund. This money is held there as a trust fund, and it was so decided by the Supreme Court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken, both about the decision as to a trust fund and of the law. In the year 1868, I think it was, Congress passed an act which declared that all that money should be turned into the Treasury of the United States, and it is no more a trust fund than is any other money in the Treasury that is liable, upon the decision of Congress or of the courts, to respond to some claim.

Mr. HEREFORD. The Supreme Court has decided that it is a trust fund.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot help that.

Mr. HEREFORD. I understand the Senator, then, not to be willing to be bound by the decision of the Supreme Court in this very case?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know when that decision of the Supreme Court was made, but whenever it was made, I wish to say, as I have said often before, when my duty as a law-maker is called upon for action, while I shall treat with great respect the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, I must say that their decisions can have no more influence over me than mine over them.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him a question? Does the Senator from Vermont maintain that the title to this property has passed to the General Government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not said anything about that.

Mr. HEREFORD. I put that question to the Senator from Vermont. I put the question to the Senator from Vermont as the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, whether in this particular case the title has passed to the General Government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. As chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I have no authority to answer, because I am not instructed by that committee.

Mr. HEREFORD. As a Senator I put the question to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As one of the Senators on this floor I will answer with the permission of my friend from Minnesota, because I do not wish to prolong this business; it is altogether too juicy to be kept back from the supreme moment of decision. I will say that in my judgment the cotton to which this man makes a claim is just as much the property of the United States as the cannon that may have been captured when General Sherman captured Savannah, and all the cannon in it, because like the cannon this cotton was contraband of war.

Mr. HEREFORD. I understand the Senator from Vermont to maintain that this cotton is like the cannon captured at the same time. Then if it be like that, under the decision of the Supreme Court, if the parties to whom the cannon belonged were confederates they could have sued for it and had a judgment for this very cannon against the Government; and the Supreme Court has so decided. Those cases are parallel. Certainly the Senator from Vermont will not maintain such a proposition.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, what difference does it make, so far as Mr. Mitchell's claim is concerned here, whether the Government of the United States has any title or not to this cotton?

Mr. HEREFORD. It makes this difference, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEREFORD. The chairman of the Committee on Claims says it makes no difference whether the Government owns this property or not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I asked the question whether it did, so far as this claim is concerned.

Mr. HEREFORD. I say that with me when I come to cast my vote it makes a great deal of difference, and the difference is this: this Government as an honest Government will never keep property which does not belong to it; it would be dishonest to do so.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then the Senator in his action here, because the Government should not do that, would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $128,000 to some person who is not entitled to it. That is the condition Mr. Mitchell is in here. He has no title to this property. The Supreme Court has decided distinctly that he has no title to the property, and yet the Senator from West Virginia would by his vote take from the Treasury of the United States this large amount of money and give it to Mr. Mitchell.

The Senator from Florida puts this question upon the right ground. There is no law for it, it is against the law, but Congress as the supreme legislative authority of the country can make a law. That is the position of the Senator from Florida, and he appeals to the Senate to pass a law conferring this right upon Warren Mitchell, because he was, as he says, a faithful and honest citizen during the war. At the time the Senator from Florida made his report upon this claim nothing whatever was known of the action of Mr. Mitchell during his sojourn within the confederacy. The Senator from Florida, having made his report to the Senate, moved, on the 2d of March, 1877, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Warren Mitchell.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I object to the consideration of the bill.

I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 5, part 3, Forty-fourth Congress, second session, page 2079, and following:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit it to the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask for a division.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire from what committee the bill is reported?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. From the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Would it be proper for me to make a statement in regard to this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. A bill for the relief of the claimant was referred to the Committee on Claims at the last session of the present Congress. It was considered by the committee during that session. It was referred to me for special examination. I made such examination and reported adversely. The report was concurred in by this committee and concurred in by the Senate, and the bill was indefinitely postponed. Subsequently the bill was recommitted to the committee. It was again considered by the Committee on Claims and a majority of the committee reported in favor of the bill. In examining another case referred to the Committee on Claims since that time, the committee have discovered some very important evidence bearing upon this claim. It was claimed that this claimant, Warren Mitchell, was loyal during the late civil war. In examining the case of Connor Brothers, we had occasion to look into certain testimony taken before the district court for the district of Kentucky; and it appears from that testimony that this same claimant, Warren Mitchell, was employed by the confederate government at Nashville prior to the occupation of Nashville by the Federal forces, for the purpose of packing meat for the confederate government. He had a contract with the confederate government by which the live hog was furnished to him, he agreeing to slaughter the hog and return the hams, sides, and shoulders to the confederate government and retain the rest of the hog for his pay. Immediately before the occupation of Nashville by the Federal forces he left with the confederate army and went South. This testimony, I will state, was not before the Committee on Claims at the time the bill was reported from the committee.

Subsequent debate ensued and the bill was recommitted. This fact and others all appear in the present report adverse to the claim.

Much has been said of the loyalty of Mr. Mitchell before the war. It is stated in the affidavit of Robert Floyd, in speaking of the claimant Mitchell:

> I regarded him as a true Union man and supporter of the Government until the leading public men of Kentucky published an address to the people announcing a neutral position. After that I think Mr. Mitchell held that doctrine, but was quiet and unobtrusive. I so regarded him when he left for the South.

Hon. Bland Ballard, in a letter submitted among the papers, dated May 30, 1876, addressed to Hon. John W. Stevenson, then a Senator from Kentucky, says:

> I do not know what were Mr. Mitchell's views of the rebellion. If he sympathized with it, and I have heard and believe he did, I regret it.

With this, to say the least, doubtful condition, Mr. Mitchell passed through the lines upon a permit from General Anderson and entered into these transactions with persons in the southern confederacy, not procuring the cotton which paid his debts alone, but, as I said on a former day during this debate, he procured cotton worth $12,000 more than the entire indebtedness shown upon the books of both firms of which Mitchell was a member. It is not to be supposed that Mr. Mitchell could collect the whole amount of that indebtedness; he must have collected a comparatively small portion of it; and yet we find him with cotton in Savannah amounting to $12,000 more than the whole indebtedness. We find him making contracts for the transportation of this cotton with persons who had an interest in it with him, delivering it in Savannah, and keeping it there with the other cotton owned by those who were citizens of the confederacy.

Mr. President, so far as the loyalty of Mr. Mitchell is concerned, the facts here show conclusively to my mind that he was a disloyal man, and upon that ground that he cannot claim anything from the Government of the United States; and, as a matter of law, it is settled by the highest tribunal in the land that he has no claim whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh no, let us finish this business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss this question at any length whatever, but in voting as I shall against the payment of this claim, I desire to say a word or two. From all that I can learn, the claimant is a very respectable gentleman, a man occupying a high position in the community where he lives and where he is best known. I should be very glad if I could consistently vote to give him the sum of money which he demands; but the highest court in the land has said that he has no claim of title to this property.

I am sorry to see that this is regarded as a political question; but I shall not allow politics to get into my vote if I can help it. It has been said that there are to be two thousand million dollars—that is the round number—paid for what, forsooth, they call southern claims; and as this is the first one in the year 1879 that I am to vote upon I want to vote against it, so that the people whom I in part represent upon this floor may know exactly where I shall stand hereafter if I live and represent them. I understand there have been paid, some say one hundred, others two hundred, million dollars of southern claims. That amount has been paid to good loyal republican citizens by the action of a republican House and a republican Senate. It is about time to put a stop to it, and I propose to begin now with this claim. I have examined at some length very many of the claims that are now pending here called southern war claims. I have made up my mind that I shall vote for a very few of them, not to exceed half a dozen, so far as I now know, and the whole amount will not be over $500,000. I want that to go to the people I represent as well as to the people whom I do not represent at the South who are making these claims.

In saying this I have said about all that I care to say with regard to this matter. If the Supreme Court had decided that the claimant had a legal title to this property he would have been paid long ago; he would have been paid by the action of that very court. I do not feel quite like my honorable friend from Vermont in this particular instance. I believe I have no criticism to make upon the action of the Supreme Court; I shall follow to its legitimate result the action of that court, and therefore I shall vote against the payment of this claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] with whom I am paired, is at home sick, and I refrain from voting, not knowing how he would vote on this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think, speaking for the Senator from Minnesota, that if the Senator from West Virginia wishes to vote in favor of this bill, he is paired; but if he wishes to vote against it, I think the Senator from Minnesota would also vote that way.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is the Senator from Vermont authorized to speak for the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Only on general principles, Mr. President.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his named was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. SHARON.] If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. MATTHEWS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD.] If he were here, I suppose he would vote "yea," and I should certainly vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] If he were here, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SARGENT, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WADLEIGH, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] upon political questions. Not deeming this to be such, I shall vote "nay."

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. WINDOM] is absent, detained from the Senate by sickness. I feel authorized to say he would vote "nay" upon this bill if he were present.

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CONOVER.] Not knowing exactly how he would vote upon this question, I shall refrain from voting.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] I do not know how he would vote upon this question, and I decline to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 31; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate of January 17, 1879, to print 1,000 copies of the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition, for sale by the Public Printer, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the resolution of the Senate of December 16, 1878, providing for binding the copies of Walker's Statistical Atlas heretofore ordered, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 43) to provide for taking testimony to be used before Congress in cases of private claims against the United States;

A bill (S. No. 878) to disapprove and annul an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, passed on the 18th of January, 1878, by a two-third vote of both houses over the veto of the governor of said Territory;

A bill (S. No. 1038) for the relief of Jesse Turner and others, sureties upon the official bond of George W. Clarke, formerly Indian agent;

A bill (S. No. 1060) authorizing the Secretary of War to erect headstones over the graves of Union soldiers who have been interred in private, village, or city cemeteries;

A bill (S. No. 1277) to extend the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the southern district of Florida;

A bill (S. No. 623) to amend sections 900 and 993 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the District of Columbia, so as to make the 22d day of February a holiday within said District;

A bill (S. No. 1151) to amend section 5497 of the Revised Statutes, relating to embezzlement by officers of the United States; and

THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH, AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolutions I had the honor to offer some days ago, which are well understood by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be reported by the Secretary to the Senate for information.

The resolutions were read.

Mr. GORDON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATTHEWS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD.] I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. SHARON] upon political questions. If this is regarded as a political question I shall not vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It looks very much like it.

Mr. RANSOM. I should like for his colleague, the Senator from Nevada, [MR. JONES,] to say whether he regards it as a political question or not, and if he thinks it is I shall not vote.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I so regard it now.

Mr. RANSOM. I shall not vote.

Mr. SARGENT, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] I should like to inquire of his colleague [Mr. WITHERS] if he considers this to be a political question?

Mr. WITHERS. Judging from the character of the vote, it will be so treated.

Mr. SARGENT. I withhold my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BAILEY, (after having voted "yea.") As the vote on the motion to adjourn is assuming a political cast, I shall observe my pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] upon political questions, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GARLAND. I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] on all political questions and I decline to vote upon the pending motion. If he were here, I should vote "nay" on this motion. I cannot say how he would vote.

Mr. BUTLER, (after having voted "yea.") I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CONOVER] on all political questions. This being regarded as a political question by some, I ask leave to withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] if he considers this to be a political question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We cannot very well have a debate on this question.

Mr. HARRIS. I voted "nay" myself, and I intend to stick to that vote because I desire that the Senator from Vermont may get his resolutions up for consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only say that we cannot have debate on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from Tennessee rise to ask a question of the Chair?

Mr. HARRIS. I simply rose to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he considers this to be a political question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is debate, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I withdraw my question.

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] on political questions. I cannot doubt that quite a number of Senators regard this as a political question, and therefore I shall observe my pair.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (after having voted "yea.") I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] I supposed when I voted that this was not a political question, but it has taken that turn.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHAFFEE, (after having voted "nay.") Upon all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. EUSTIS.] As this is regarded as a political question I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.] If he were here, I should vote "yea" and I suppose he would vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (after having voted "nay.") I am told that this is a political question. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. WALLACE,] and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. PADDOCK. On this question, which seems to be considered as a political one, I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.]

Mr. PLUMB, (after having voted "nay.") As this seems to be a political question, I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.]

Mr. GROVER, (after having voted "yea.") I beg leave to withdraw my vote. I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER,] who is absent.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Barnum,	Eaton,	McCreery,	Voorhees,
Bayard,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Withers.
Beck,	Hereford,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Kernan,	Shields,
Davis of Illinois.	Lamar,	Thurman,

NAYS—26.

Allison,	Dawes,	Howe,	Morrill,
Anthony,	Dorsey,	Jones of Nevada,	Oglesby,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Booth,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Bruce,	Hamlin,	Maxey,	Spencer.
Burnside,	Harris,	Mitchell,
Conkling.	Hill,	Morgan,

ABSENT—33.

Bailey,	Dennis,	McDonald,	Sharon,
Butler,	Eustis,	Matthews,	Toller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	Merrimon,	Wadleigh,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	Paddock,	Wallace,
Chaffee,	Hoar,	Patterson,	Whyte,
Christiancy,	Ingalls,	Plumb,	Windom.
Coke,	Johnston,	Randolph,
Conover,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Davis of W. Va.,	Kirkwood,	Sargent,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to proceed to the consideration of the resolutions offered by him, which have been reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CONOVER.] I suppose there can be no doubt about this being a political question, and therefore I shall not vote.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. WALLACE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CHAFFEE, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. EUSTIS.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.] This I assume to be a political question. If he were here, I should vote "nay;" I suppose he would vote "yea;" and therefore I decline to vote.

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) On political questions I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MATTHEWS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MERRIMON, (when his name was called.) On this vote I shall observe my pair with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. PADDOCK, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. SHARON.] I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. SARGENT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] and I would vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. WADLEIGH, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.] If he were here, I presume he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Allison.	Dawes.	Jones of Nevada,	Oglesby,
Anthony,	Dorsey,	Kellogg,	Patterson
Bayard,	Edmunds,	Kernan,	Rollins,

ABSENT—31.

Bailey,	Conover,	Hoar,	Matthews,
Butler,	Davis of W. Va.,	Ingalls,	Merrimon,
Cameron of Pa.,	Dennis,	Johnston,	Paddock,

Chaffee,	Garland,	Kirkwood,	Randolph,
Christiancy,	Grover,	McDonald,	Ransom,

Sargent,	Teller,	Wallace,	Windom.
Sharon,	Wadleigh,	Whyte,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS on the 7th of January relative to the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama, that the Senate now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 27, noes 17; and (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 28, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NARRATIVE OF THE POLARIS EXPEDITION.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business coming over from Saturday is a report from the Committee on Printing, presented by the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] and is the Senate resolutions to provide for the publication of an edition of the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition. The pending question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw that amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by the committee to the resolutions of the Senate; and the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon concurring in the resolutions of the Senate as amended; and they were concurred in.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF WALKER'S ATLAS.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with an amendment, a resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of Walker's Statistical Atlas.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the copies of Walker's Statistical Atlas heretofore ordered for the use of the two Houses of Congress be bound by the Public Printer.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of line 3 insert the words "and the Department of the Interior."

At the end of line 4 insert the following: "In cloth with American Russia leather and backs and ends."

The amendments were agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS IN INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement showing the number of public documents received by that Department for distribution on behalf of the Government during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5315) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the records and files of district and circuit courts of the United States lost or destroyed.

Mr. MILLS. Is not the morning hour the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6240) making appropriations for the legislative, executive and judicial departments of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to reserve all points of order on that bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I give notice that I will call up this bill for consideration upon the conclusion of the Army bill.

PRESENTMENT OF THE UNITED STATES COURT, NEW YORK.

Mr. ATKINS also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back a letter from the clerk of the United States circuit court of New York City, transmitting a presentment of the grand jury made at a recent term of that court; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC DAMS AT FALLS OF SAINT ANTHONY.

Mr. STEWART, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6241) to authorize the construction of a flume or sluiceway through the public dams and other works at the Falls of Saint Anthony on the Mississippi River, to regulate the use thereof and to appropriate money therefor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND.

Mr. KNAPP. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a bill for the relief of soldiers and sailors becoming totally blind in the service of the country.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The bill was read, and provides that the act of June 17, 1878, entitled "An act to increase the pensions of certain soldiers and sailors who have lost both their hands, or both their feet, or the sight of both eyes in the service of the country," shall be so construed that all soldiers and sailors who have become totally blind from causes occurring in the service of the United States shall receive, in lieu of all pensions now paid them by the Government of the United States, and there shall be paid to them in the same manner as pensions are now paid such persons, the sum of $72 per month.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the special assignment for to-day.

Mr. KNAPP. Then I ask that the bill I have introduced be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. CONGER. I supposed that had already been done when I called for the regular order. I think if the gentleman will ask for the passage of the bill at this time there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the regular order interrupted the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I supposed that the gentleman introduced the bill for reference only and that it had been referred.

Mr. KNAPP. I asked for its passage.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TIPTON. I think that is the law now.

Mr. KNAPP. It is not the law now.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is this bill introduced for reference?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The gentleman introducing it asks for its present consideration.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think it should be referred.

The SPEAKER. If the bill shall be referred the Chair thinks it might be lost, as the committee may not be called again, unless the committee is clothed with power to report at any time.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. It is only justice to those soldiers who are totally blind.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House, that this bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and that they have the right to report it back at any time.

Mr. BANNING. I think the objection is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it is not withdrawn.

There being no objection the bill (H. R. No. 6242) was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, with leave to report the same back at any time for consideration.

UNSURVEYED ISLANDS, ETC.

Mr. ELAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6243) to convey any title the United States may have to any unsurveyed islands and beds of meandered lakes and sloughs and ponds not navigable to the respective States in which they are situated; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the special assignment for to-day after the reading of the Journal, being the bill (H. R. No. 2423) to restrict the immigration of Chinese to the United States, reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with amendment. The bill will be read.

The bill, with the committee amendments, was read, as follows:

Strike out the parts in brackets, and insert the parts in italics.

Be it enacted, &c., That no master of any vessel owned in whole or in part by a citizen of the United States, or by a citizen of any foreign country, nor other person, shall take on board such vessel, at any port [of] or place within the Chinese Empire, or at any other foreign port or place whatever, any number exceeding [ten] fifteen Chinese passengers, whether male or female, with the intent to bring such passengers to the United States, or shall bring such passengers to any number exceeding [ten] fifteen on one voyage within the jurisdiction of the United States.

SEC. 2. That whenever the master or other person in charge of any such vessel takes on board the same, at any foreign port or place, any greater number of Chinese passengers than is prescribed in the first section of this act, with intent to bring such passengers to the United States, or bring such passengers to any number exceeding [ten] fifteen on one voyage within the jurisdiction of the United States, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall for each passenger so taken on board or brought within the jurisdiction of the United States exceeding the number of [ten] fifteen, be fined $100, and may also be imprisoned for not exceeding six months.

SEC. 3. That the master of any vessel arriving in the United States, or any of the Territories thereof, from any foreign place whatever, at the same time that he delivers a manifest of the cargo, and if there be no cargo, then at the time of making report or entry of the vessel pursuant to law, shall, in addition to the other matters required to be reported by law, deliver and report to the collector of the district in which such vessel shall arrive a separate list of all Chinese passengers taken on board the vessel at any foreign port or place, and of all such passengers on board the vessel at that time; such list shall be sworn to by the master in the same manner as directed by law in relation to the manifest of the cargo; and the refusal or neglect of the master to comply with the provisions of this section shall receive the same penalties, disabilities, and forfeitures as are provided for a refusal or neglect to report and deliver a manifest of the cargo.

SEC. 4. That the amount of the several penalties imposed by the foregoing provisions shall be liens on the vessels violating those provisions; and such vessel shall be libeled therefor in any circuit or district court of the United States where such vessel shall arrive.

[SEC. 5. That informers shall be entitled to one-half of any penalty or fine collected under the provisions of this act upon their information.]

SEC. [6] 5. That nothing herein contained shall be held to repeal or modify any law forbidding the importation of coolies, or of females for immoral purposes, into the United States: Provided, That no consul or consular agent of the United States, residing at any port from which any vessel taking Chinese passengers may take her departure, shall grant the certificate provided for in section 2162 of the Revised Statutes for more than [ten] fifteen Chinese passengers on any one vessel.

SEC. [7] 6. That this act shall take effect from and after the first day of [September] July, eighteen hundred and seventy-[eight] nine.

When the Clerk in reading the bill had read section 5,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon, said: I ask permission to offer an amendment to come in after section 5.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not being read for amendment; merely for information.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I now ask that the report be read.

Mr. CONGER. Before the report is read we may as well come to an understanding about this matter. The first reading of the bill, as I understand it, was for information merely. Will it be again read by sections for amendment?

The SPEAKER. This is a report from a committee, and the question will be subject to the will of the majority of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman who has charge of the bill whether it is proposed to allow amendments and discussion of this bill?

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. As soon as the report is read I will submit a motion which will determine that.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman now whether it is proposed to have the bill read for amendments?

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. My instruction from the committee is to secure the passage of this bill without further amendments than those reported from the committee. As soon as the report is read I will demand the previous question on the bill, and the time will then be equally divided between the friends and opponents of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that the committee have proposed some amendments.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. Those amendments are incorporated in the bill.

Mr. CONGER. But they have not been read as amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have them read for action. The Chair understands the gentleman from Kentucky in charge of the bill [Mr. WILLIS] to give notice that he will demand the previous question on the bill and amendments of the committee. If that demand shall be sustained the effect of it will be to cut off any amendments from any other quarter.

Mr. CONGER. Must not this bill be read by sections even for the committee amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the bill read by sections; but that does not change the position of the matter. The amendments as reported by the committee will be read in connection with each section. If the previous question be sustained, the effect, as heretofore stated by the Chair——

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I hope the demand for the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] refuses now in advance to admit amendments to be voted on except those of the committee, or to permit discussion other than what may come after the previous question is seconded.

The SPEAKER. There would be an hour for discussion if the gentleman from Kentucky should so desire; and that gentleman has indicated to the Chair that he is under obligation to yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. CONGER. But that will be after the previous question is seconded.

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to decide whether the call for the previous question shall be sustained; if not, the bill will of course be open to amendment and debate.

Mr. CONGER. But if on the other side of the House there is no agreement, but on the contrary a distinct refusal to permit any amendment, or any discussion except that which may follow the previous question, we desire to know it now, that we may resort to any parliamentary remedies we may have.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is the purpose of the gentleman from Kentucky to demand the previous question, and if it should be sustained, to allow the debate which the rules permit after the previous question is seconded, but to shut out amendments other than those that have been agreed upon in committee and are now reported to the House with the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that when this House consents to a special order——

Mr. COX, of New York. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to hear the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. COX, of New York. But he is making a speech, not propounding a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that when this House consents to the consideration of a bill either by unanimous consent or by a suspension of the rules the bill comes up for consideration as it would in other cases.

The SPEAKER. This bill does not occupy a different position from any other bill that might be before the House for consideration.

Mr. CONGER. There are many gentlemen on this side of the House who favor the passage of the bill; but we desire to offer some amendments and to discuss it.

The SPEAKER. But if the House chooses to shut out amendments by sustaining the previous question, that is a matter for the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was made a special order it was generally expected that the day would be given for the discussion of the bill. Many members on this side would like——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with that matter.

Mr. COX, of New York. I object to debate.

Mr. PAGE. It was expected that the day would be given for discussion and that at four o'clock the previous question would be called.

Mr. COX, of New York. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects to debate.

Mr. PAGE. I am not debating the bill.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The people of California want action, not words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is not in order.

Mr. PAGE. This bill has been made the subject of a caucus on the other side, while this side has had no opportunity to consider it at all. I hope, however, that no gentleman on this side will oppose the seconding of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky demands the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. CONGER. Pending that, I move that this bill be considered by the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on seconding the demand for the previous question. If this be voted down, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. But if the motion which I submit is in order, it decides the question.

The SPEAKER. But it is not in order in preference to the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Then I move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole. That I believe is in order.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Chair to have the rule read in reference to the motion to refer as a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The effect of a demand for the previous question is to exclude all other motions except a motion to adjourn. If it be sustained, it will cut off the offering of amendments, and will allow, under the rule, one hour for debate. If not sustained, it throws the bill open to amendment and to lengthened debate. The remedy of the gentleman from Michigan is to induce a majority of the House to vote down the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Chair whether a motion to refer does not take precedence of the demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It does not; for the reason that the House has the right by a majority vote to control action on the bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Michigan has not the floor to make the motion to refer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is not recognized for that purpose. The bill is in charge of the gentleman from Kentucky who reports it, and until there is an adverse vote of the House it will continue under his control.

Mr. BURCHARD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. How is this bill before the House at the present time? I notice that in the "order of business" it is stated that this bill was recommitted to the committee. If that statement is correct, the bill is not now before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky reports the bill from the committee, as he has a right to do.

Mr. BURCHARD. It has been reported back this morning?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir, by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 116, noes 33.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report of the committee be read.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the reading of the report. I ask the main question be now put.

The SPEAKER. It is part of the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to allow the reading of the report to come out of his time?

Mr. CONGER. That has not been proposed yet.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has the control of the hour if he wishes it.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. CONGER. Is that part of the remarks of the gentleman having the floor?

The SPEAKER. It is. The Clerk will now read the report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Education and Labor, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Education and Labor, having had under consideration sundry bills in regard to Chinese immigration, beg leave to submit the following report:

Briefly stated, this bill provides that no master of a vessel shall take on board at any port in China, or elsewhere, more than fifteen Chinese passengers with intent to bring them, or shall bring them, within the United States. The violation of this provision is made a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of $100 for each passenger and imprisonment for six months. The master is required, under like penalties, to report on his arrival a sworn list of all Chinese passengers. The penalty is made a lien upon the vessel. The bill becomes operative on the 1st day of July, 1879.

Waiving for the present any consideration of the merits of the bill, the first question is whether such legislation is within the power of Congress?

CAN CONGRESS REPEAL A TREATY?

The existing treaty with China gives its subjects an unlimited right of immigration to the United States. The second clause of article 6 of the Constitution provides that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

It is contended that any law restricting Chinese immigration would contravene this provision of the Constitution, and would therefore be null and void.

Such a construction cannot be sustained either upon principle or authority. The objects for which the Constitution was formed are higher than any power granted under it. The general welfare, justice, domestic tranquillity, and the blessings of liberty are of supreme importance, and cannot be taken from the people by any treaty however solemnly ratified. The treaty-making power is limited by these objects. Moreover, both in nature and by international law, the first duty is self-preservation. If, therefore, it be true that the presence of the Chinese endangers the peace or prosperity of our people, no mere technical considerations should intervene to prevent an increase of the evil.

The clause of the Constitution above quoted does not, however, admit of the construction contended for. It elevates treaties from the status of mere compacts to the dignity of laws, but does not clothe them with any additional superiority.

Laws made in pursuance of the Constitution are equally as binding and authoritative as treaties, and, if last enacted, control any contravening treaty. This conclusion is enforced by numerous decisions both of the executive and judicial departments of the Government. In 1851, in the case of the Florida claims, an apparent conflict between a treaty and a subsequent act of Congress was decided by Attorney-General Crittenden in these words: "An act of Congress is as much a supreme law of the land as a treaty. They are placed on the same footing, and no preference or superiority is given to the one or the other. The last expression of the law-giving power must prevail, and just for the same reason and on the same principle that a subsequent act must prevail and have effect, though inconsistent with a prior act; so must an act of Congress have effect, though inconsistent with a prior treaty." (Opinions Attorney-General, volume 5, page 345.)

To the same effect is the decision of Attorney-General Akerman in the case of the Choctaw Indians. "There is nothing in the Constitution which assigns different ranks to treaties and to statutes; both the one and the other, when not inconsistent with the Constitution, seem to stand upon the same level and to be of equal validity; and as in the case of all laws emanating from an equal authority, the earlier in date yields to the later." (Opinions Attorney-General, volume 13, page 357.)

These decisions of the Executive Department, confirmed as they are by the teachings of Madison, of Hamilton, and of Jefferson, have been followed by the judiciary. In the case of Taylor vs. Martin, 2 Curtis, C. C. Rep., 454, the court says: "It is impossible to maintain that under our Constitution the President and Senate exclusively possess the power to modify or repeal a law found in a treaty. If this were true, no change in a treaty could be made without the consent of some foreign government. That the Constitution was designed to place our country in this helpless condition is a supposition wholly inadmissible. It is not only inconsistent with the necessities of a nation, but negatived by the express words of the Constitution. That gives to Congress, in so many words, power to declare war, an act which, ipso facto, repeals all treaties inconsistent with a state of war. It cannot, therefore, be admitted that the only method of escape from a treaty is by the consent of the other party to it or a declaration of war. To refuse to execute a treaty for reasons which approve themselves to the conscientious judgment of a nation is a matter of the utmost gravity; but the power to do so is a prerogative of which no nation can be deprived without deeply affecting its independence. That the people of the United States have deprived their Government of this power I do not believe. That it must reside somewhere, and be applicable to all cases, I am convinced, and I feel no doubt that it belongs to Congress."

Similar opinions have been delivered in the circuit courts of the country. These decisions were finally reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Cherokee Tobacco Case, reported in 11 Wallace, page 616. The court says: "The effect of treaties and acts of Congress, when in conflict, is not settled by the Constitution. But the question is not involved in any doubt as to its proper solution. A treaty may supersede a prior act of Congress, (2 Peters, 314,) and an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty, (2 Curtis, 454; 1 Woolworth, 155.) In the cases referred to, these principles were applied to treaties with foreign nations. Treaties with Indian nations cannot be more obligatory. They have no higher sanctity, and no greater inviolability or immunity from legislative invasion can be claimed for them. The act of Congress must prevail, as if the treaty were not an element to be considered. If a wrong has been done, the power of redress is with Congress, not with the judiciary."

Upon principle, therefore, as well as upon the authority of precedents, judicial and administrative, it would seem clear that Congress has the right, by appropriate legislation, to change or to abrogate any existing treaty. Indeed, Congress has in one instance expressly exercised this power. The act of July 7, 1798, declares that the existing treaties with France are no longer obligatory upon the United States. (1 Statutes at Large, page 578.)

PREVIOUS EFFORTS AT RELIEF.

The evils of Chinese immigration have been fully recognized upon the Pacific slope for many years. Welcomed at first as a unique addition to the society and a valuable ally in the development of the material resources of their new home, the Chinese, by their sordid, selfish, immoral, and non-amalgamating habits, within a very short time reversed the judgment in their favor and came to be regarded as a standing menace to the social and political institutions of the country.

The State laws which had been enacted having been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, and every other means of relief proving ineffectual, it was finally determined to appeal to Congress. Accordingly, as early as the 23d of December, 1869, at the second session of the Forty-first Congress, an effort was made, but without success, to secure restrictive legislation. In the Forty-second Congress, and also in the Forty-third Congress, numerous memorials, resolutions of public meetings, and petitions, one of which numbered over 16,000 signatures, were presented to the same effect and with the same result. At the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress these renewed appeals for relief met for the first time with a favorable response. A joint resolution was introduced and passed calling upon the President of the United States to "open negotiations with the Chinese government for the purpose of modifying the provisions of the treaty between the two countries and restricting the same to commercial purposes."

Subsequently, at the same session, another joint resolution was passed, requesting the President to present to the Chinese government an additional article to the treaty of July 28, 1868, reserving mutually to the two governments the right to regulate, restrict, or prevent immigration to their respective countries. These authoritative requests on the part of Congress failed to secure the desired relief. In the mean while the question had assumed dangerous proportions. The conviction that Chinese immigration was a great evil was so deep-seated and unanimous that mob violence was openly threatened, and in many instances the arm of the law seemed powerless to protect. Recognizing the exigency, the Legislature of California appointed a special committee, whose report, based upon the testimony of witnesses familiar with the subject, ably and graphically sets forth the objections to the Chinese. Subsequently to this, a joint committee appointed by the Forty-fourth Congress collected voluminous testimony upon the same subject, and by a majority report urged upon the executive department the necessity for an immediate change of the Burlingame treaty, to the end that such immigration might be restricted or prevented. These reports, together with other official documents upon the subject, were laid before the present Congress.

Your committee, in view of the importance and urgency of the question, after a patient hearing of the evidence and argument on both sides, at an early date after its organization presented a resolution which with a slight modification passed both Houses of Congress. This resolution again called attention to the obnoxious features in the Burlingame treaty, and requested prompt action on the part of the executive department in securing its change or abrogation. In view of the almost unanimous sentiment of the people of the Pacific slope as to the necessity of such action, it was hoped that these successive resolutions of Congress, together with the various petitions, memorials, and official data in the possession of the Government, would cause negotiations to be opened for that purpose. Such action would have been preferable to the direct interference by Congress, inasmuch as it would have been free from all doubt as to its legality, and would not have jeopardized the friendly feelings and commercial intercourse between the two countries. Moreover, when a change of the treaty was first suggested by Congress and indeed up to a very recent date, it is believed that the Chinese government would have made no serious objection, as its policy was opposed to the emigration of its citizens. However desirable such a result, it has thus far not been accomplished. The petitions to secure remedial legislation were presented within a year after the ratification of the Burlingame treaty. These were vigorously renewed at every subsequent session until finally in the Forty-fourth Congress the resolution already referred to was passed, calling the attention of the executive department to the necessity of a change in the treaty. This resolution was again presented and passed in the second session of the present Congress, but has not, as far as your committee is informed, called forth any practical effort at action. So long a period of non-action proves either the unwillingness or the inability of the treaty-making power to cope with the question. In either event your committee consider that further delay would work great injustice to a large portion of our country, provided the evils whereof they complain are well founded.

RESTRICTIVE LEGISLATION NECESSARY.

That these complaints are not without cause cannot, upon the evidence, be doubted. Your committee, in a report accompanying joint resolution H. R. No. 123, at the second session of this Congress, endeavored to present what seemed to them some insuperable objections to Chinese immigration. Further examination of facts only confirms the conclusions therein stated. This whole question is not one of right, but of policy. There is no principle upon which we are compelled to receive into our midst the natives of Asia, Africa, or any other part of the world. The character, source, and extent of immigration should be regulated and controlled with reference to our own wants and welfare. The difficult problems, economic and political, resulting from the presence of the red and black races would be renewed in a more aggravated and dangerous form by the yellow race. The Mongolian, unlike the Indian, is brought in daily contact with our social and political life; and, unlike the African, does not surrender any of his marked peculiarities by reason of that contact. It is neither possible nor desirable for two races as distinct as the Caucasian and Mongolian to live under the same government without assimilation. The degradation or slavery of one or the other would be the inevitable result. Homogeneity of ideas and of physical and social habits are essential to national harmony and progress. Equally grave objections may be urged against the Chinese from an industrial stand-point. Our laboring people cannot and ought not to be subjected to a competition which involves the surrender of the sacred and elevating influences of home and the sacrifice of the ordinary appliances of personal civilization. The question, therefore, is not one of competition, but of a substitution of one kind of labor for another.

No self-governing country can afford to diminish or destroy the dignity, the welfare, and independence of its citizens. Justice to the people of the Pacific slope, the dictates of common humanity and benevolence, as well as the plainest suggestions of practical statesmanship, all demand that the problem of Chinese immigration shall be solved while it is yet within the legislative control.

Governed by these views, your committee present and recommend the passage of the bill accompanying this report.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. How much time have I remaining of my hour?

The SPEAKER. Forty-five minutes; fifteen minutes have been consumed in the reading of the report.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I desire, then, to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] one-half of that time.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he will yield to me for ten minutes?

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. There are a number of gentlemen who desire me to yield to them, and if I yield to one I must yield to all. My desire is to divide the time between the opponents and friends of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman yields twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. Yes, sir: one-half of my remaining time.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman informed the House he would give one-half of the time to this side.

The SPEAKER. The usual practice has been to give one-half of the time to the opponents and the other half to the friends of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. That would give thirty minutes to this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky gives one-half of the remaining time allowed for debate to the other side.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.] He prefers, I understand, to use the last of the time, and if the Chair will have the kindness to remind me when twenty minutes have elapsed I will be obliged to him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do so with pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. In speaking, Mr. Speaker, on this subject I disclaim all intention to speak for the republican party or for any party but myself. I stand here, sir, as an individual of the human race with my rights officially upon this floor, and I stand here to oppose the virtual breaking of social and political relations with one-third of the human race. I have nothing to charge against the dominant party in this House, although the first treaty under which these immigrations have occurred was negotiated in good old democratic days, but it was in days when the light of heaven sometimes reached the brain of the democracy. [Laughter.] And, sir, I credit to the democracy not only the making of the treaty, but the prosperity which has accrued to the Pacific coast from the adoption of it. California owes what she is in the agricultural world, her grains, her fruits, her agricultural prosperity to the treaty of 1858 and the one subsequently negotiated. It was before Kearney came and before Kearney was represented in the national halls.

But it is said we must take unusual ground for the benefit of the laboring classes in this country. The laboring classes in this country, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] said, are starving. "Two hundred millions of them," [laughter,] said the gentleman from Pennsylvania, "are starving!" Two hundred millions in this country are starving! [Great laughter.] And he said, besides, that there are in Pennsylvania five thousand in the lunatic asylum from the hardness of the times. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that lunatics sometimes are made by hardness of the times, sometimes by unrequited love, and lunatics are sometimes made from unsatisfied ambition, [laughter,] and the Pennsylvania lunatics made by the latter cause do not always stay at home within the State of Pennsylvania. [Great laughter.]

I stand here not to disparage, not to underrate the suffering of the laboring classes or other classes in this country. It has been very great; it is very great to-day; it has been always very great in the world. The struggle to keep the wolf away from the door is the hardest struggle humanity has to make, and yet it is what has made humanity what it has come to be in the better portions of Christendom. The hard soils of Pennsylvania—there are some good soils there—the hard soils of the hardest part of New York, and the hard soils of New England have made a body of men whom we may be proud of before the world and before Heaven.

But, sir, do not let us forget another thing, that in the midst of these hard times the year 1878 in the United States of America was the year of the greatest prosperity that has ever occurred to any people since the dawn of creation. There never has been a period in any land when labor could buy with its rewards so much to eat, to drink, and to wear and with which to provide for its loved ones, as the year 1878; and all this has occured to a great degree because we have overridden the fanatics of the olden time. It is the "Heathen Chinee" to-day that we are called to suppress. I say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] who has charge of this bill and who represents Louisville, Kentucky, that I remember the day when the cry was against the Catholic Irish, against the condemned Germans, and when the streets of his city flowed with blood and when the streets of Saint Louis, in Missouri, flowed with blood in the riots against the Irish and the Germans because they were coming here to take away the labor of the American citizen and rob his children of their bread. Those who got up those riots were overruled. Thank God, I had a hand in it. I was in a minority. The great men of the democratic party, many of them of the State of New York, were on the other side. Erastus Brooks of the Evening Express, a trusted leader of the party to-day, was, if I remember rightly, the head of what was called the American Order, organized to protect the country against the inroads of what they deemed hordes of Irish and Germans. But, sir, we put them down by the use of hard common sense. We beat them, though we were in a minority. My State gave 200,000 majority in favor of oppression and exclusion. But, sir, our unparalleled prosperity which has crowned us in this country has been due in a great degree to the sturdy, stalwart labor of the Irish and the Germans.

Some one says "demagogue." Is it Bill Nye that says it? [Laughter.] I have Bill Nye here, [holding up a volume,] [laughter,] and I will allow Truthful James in a few moments to read his dreadful indictment against the "Heathen Chinee."

Now, sir, I did not join in that raid against the Irish and the Germans. I have never yet joined in a raid against anybody, and now that old age is upon me I hope that God will give me grace for the future hours I have to live to keep me from joining in a crusade against any portion of the race that has descended from Adam.

Sir, this Chinese immigration is put in a light that will bear a great deal of criticism. The only accurate information that I can get of what the number of the Chinese in the West amounts to is from the census of 1870, which shows the total number of Chinese in Oregon, in California, and in Nevada was in that year only fifty-five thousand. I once spent a week in the Golden State and the best information I could get about the number of the Chinese there was that the number did not exceed seventy-five thousand on the Pacific coast. For the last three years they have not materially, if at all, increased; and I do not believe that there are to-day more than seventy-five thousand men that we are called upon to legislate against.

What is the matter with these men? A gentleman in Washington now, a distinguished merchant of California, whom for political reasons I will not name, has said to me, within the last week, "I have dealt to the amount of more than half a million of dollars in small sums with the Chinese merchants in San Francisco. They never violated their word, and I never lost a dollar by them." Do not these men earn their fee and bounty? The charge is that they come and make us rich and do not take away money enough to pay for their services.

Ah, but we have a new school of philosophers; such as went before our labor committee and for weeks twaddled about overproduction. I refer to the committee presided over by my friend Mr. HEWITT, of New York. They declared that the sufferings of the laboring people in this country arose from the fact that there was too much production; we were ruining our laboring people by furnishing them too much clothing; by furnising them too much food; the country was getting to be all piled up with food, all loaded down with clothing, and hence starvation and nakedness.

Sir, these are not the laboring-men. They are demagogues and idlers at corner groceries; men who are supported by the labor of their wives and never do a day's work from year's end to year's end. These are really the men represented by my friend from Pennsylvania in his half hour's speech of yesterday. What labor does Kearney perform? He is blowing his trumpet; he is hounding on his wild followers to the destruction of all we hold dear. What does he do to earn an honorable subsistence?

Mr. RYAN. He passes round the hat.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Now, fifteen minutes or twenty minutes is no time for discussing this question; but I want to call the attention of the House to another fact. I have spoken of two races that we have raised that we have endeavored to repress and drive from the country. We have had great parties, that at one time cast a large majority of all the votes in this Union, formed to destroy or drive back the coming Germans and the Irish.

But neither oppression nor repression succeeded. I have another instance of a people whom neither oppression nor repression destroyed. The Jewish people all through the ages dressed differently from their Christian neighbors. They had a different face. They lived by themselves and had a different faith. Some of their race centuries before had participated in the crucifixion of the Saviour of mankind. That crime could not be forgiven them for ages and ages. I trust we have got up to higher ground in this day. We have reached to-day the point where the next great crime to the crucifixion is even forgiven to those who committed it. And I rejoice in our higher Christianity and better civilization. These men, as I say, were persecuted; they were mobbed; they were taxed; they were oppressed; they were murdered in the streets by mobs. The mob of the middle ages played in advance all the fiendish tricks practiced by the hoodlums of California upon the "Heathen Chinee."

Time ran on, and in the nineteenth century no prince in Europe can declare war, no nation in Europe can declare war until they have asked the consent of a Jew. They must first ask for money at the counter of the Rothschilds. In the three western countries of Europe where the persecution of the Jews was the most persistent and most abominable the Jew stands to-day as the interpreter of the law and the leader of public opinion and public measures. Castellar is to-day the actual leader of the public sentiment of Spain. Gambetta in France is the leader of the republican party and of the power of that great and regenerated nation. In England Disraeli, the Earl of Beaconsfield, certainly sways the destinies of the proudest race, the most successful race, and the country of the widest possessions on earth. I do indeed indulge the hope that we shall have wisdom enough to outstrip her in the race of prosperity; but we can never do so if we take Kearney as our leader.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Don't interrupt me, for Heaven's sake. I am willing to be oppressed, I may be overridden, but I do not want to be interrupted.

Now, sir, it is said these Chinese are wicked; yes, they are wicked. I have no doubt they are wicked. All mankind are wicked. But I have never known a people who were not wicked—if you listen to those who wish to do them wrong. In the Middle Ages the Jews, it is said, stole children and crucified them. They massacred children and boiled them down so as to get their fat to conjure with.

It was said in 1854 that if we allowed Catholicism to come into our country our liberties would be gone. How many men on the opposite side of the House come here to-day except by permission of St. Patrick? I stood by him in the dark days, and I am happy to say that he did not desert me when it was proposed to send me here.

I have another thing to say about the Chinese. It is said by those who hound on the hoodlums to wrong and torture them in their quiet labor by which they shun your poor-houses that they cannot be induced to adopt the Christian religion. I say to such, and I say to all men, if you wish to make Christians of the Chinese treat them in a manner becoming Christians. A Chinese boy was in the service of an excellent Christian lady in San Francisco. She one day said to him, "John, I hope you will always be a good boy, and oh! how I wish you would love Jesus." The boy replied, "Give me a dollar a week more and I will love your Jesus."

Now, if you want these men to commingle with you, give them a dollar a week more, and I undertake that they will accept it with thanks. The real wrongs which are chargeable to the Heathen Chinee are well represented in the complaint of the gamblers Truthful James and Bill Nye, who sat down to rob Ah Sin at cards.

I read the story of the "Heathen Chinee" as recorded by Bret Harte" in the PLAIN LANGUAGE FROM TRUTHFUL JAMES.

Which I wish to remark—
And my language is plain—
That for ways that are dark
And for tricks that are vain
The Heathen Chinee is peculiar;
Which the same I would rise to explain.

Ah Sin was his name;
And I shall not deny,
In regard to the same,
What that name might imply.
But his smile it was pensive and childlike,
As I frequent remarked to Bill Nye.

It was August the third,
And quite soft was the skies,
Which it might be inferred
That Ah Sin was likewise;
Yet he played it that day upon William
And me in a way I despise.

Which we had a small game,
And Ah Sin took a hand.
It was Euchre. The same
He did not understand;
But he smiled as he sat by the table
With the smile that was childlike and bland.

Yet the cards they were stocked
In a way that I grieve,
And my feelings were shocked
At the state of Nye's sleeve,
Which was stuffed full of aces and bowers
And the same with intent to deceive.

But the hands that were played
By that Heathen Chinee
And the points that he made
Were quite frightful to see,
Till at last he put down a right bower
Which the same Nye had dealt unto me.

Then I looked up at Nye,
And he gazed upon me.
And he rose with a sigh
And said, "Can this be?
We are ruined by Chinese cheap labor."
And he went for that Heathen Chinee.

In the scene that ensued
I did not take a hand.
But the floor it was strewed,
Like the leaves on the strand,
With the cards that Ah Sin had been hiding
In the game "he did not understand."

In his sleeves, which were long,
He had twenty-four jacks;
Which was coming it strong;
Yet I state but the facts.
And we found on his nails, which were taper,
What is frequent in tapers—that's wax.

Which is why I remark,
And my language is plain,
That for ways that are dark
And for tricks that are vain
The Heathen Chinee is peculiar;
Which the same I am free to maintain.

I do not know where Bill Nye lives, but one of my friends on the other side must pardon me for saying that when I saw how the Heathen Chinee was shaken up from time to time in this House I came to the conclusion that his home was at Santa Rosa, (the home of Mr. LUTTRELL.)

Now, I have not in the time allotted been able to discuss this question. I have only been able to make a few remarks upon it. I deem it an important question—a proposition to sever all social and commercial intercourse with one-third of the human race.

Sir, when James Buchanan negotiated that first treaty, which was afterward so much enlarged by the Burlingame treaty under Lincoln, he made a step forward in the advance of civilization, Christianity, and commercial prosperity, and a step in favor of the human race; and when the treaty of Japan was negotiated the two treaties together opened to Christianity and prosperity and fraternity a portion of the world which had been shut up for centuries.

I am not for taking a step backward. I am for going forward and treating the human race as brothers. I will quote upon this subject the language of a man who does not live in California, the language of one whose lyre was always resonant with the best sympathies of humanity; I refer to the immortal Robert Burns:

Then let us pray that come it may,
As come it will for a' that,
* * * * * * *
When man to man, the warld o'er,
Shall brothers be for a' that.

[Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced to the House that the President of the United States had approved bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 5655) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1878;

A bill (H. R. No. 5501) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, ever since my advent into Congress and even before taking my seat here as a member of this body, for the past eight years or more I have been an advocate of some restrictive legislation to prevent what I regarded as one of the greatest evils of our time, an over-influx of Chinese immigration; and perhaps many members of this House have regarded the position I have taken on this question as representing extreme and perhaps harsh views. But, sir, I declare I have not been and am not now actuated by any views that are not in keeping and full accord with the generous and liberal sentiments and advanced ideas of the party to which I have had the honor to belong, and with which I have been in full accord for the past twenty years, but I trust that I am now and will be ready at all times to subscribe to every sentiment and to vote for every proposition that has in view the welfare of the country, the peace, and quietude of its citizens, the recognition of the guaranteed rights of all, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, and the protection of all alike under one flag in accordance with the Constitution of the country.

A statement of facts will appropriately precede the discussion of the bill under consideration by the House. San Francisco is the entrepôt of Oriental commerce and immigration; the point from which both are distributed to the Pacific States and the communities intermediate to the Pacific Ocean and Mississippi River. California and the adjacent States and Territories furnish not only an opening to Pacific commerce, but in the fertility of its lands, the salubrity of its climate, the remunerative wages offered to labor, and its just and generous institutions present great attractions to Oriental immigration. These considerations have operated in individual cases to bring a very limited number of intelligent Mongolians to our shores; but in the main they have led to the formation of companies which seek to utilize the cheap labor of China for their own benefit, and under contract and by monopolistic combinations, in violation of the spirit both of the treaty and laws, have introduced multitudes of the lowest classes of these aliens in our midst. These people, with facilities thus furnished, have come in hundreds and thousands, until their number has been increased in the State of California to one hundred and fifty thousand, one-sixth of the population of the State.

Of this number all but about four thousand females are adults, and the females, with a few honorable exceptions, are held in slavery by their own people for the basest purposes. If the family institution existed among them upon the ratio of numbers in American families, there should be instead of an adult population equal to the full vote of the whole State of California only twenty-five thousand adult Chinese among us.

The profits of labor go principally to the Chinese companies who introduce and control these aliens, with only a very limited pittance to the laborer himself; and of the grand aggregate of profits made by the companies and individuals comparatively little is invested in the State.

Of the six hundred millions of taxable property in California, only one and a half millions is owned by the Chinese, upon which they pay less than $10,000 annual taxes. A population of one-sixth of that of the State, paying less than one four-hundredth part of the revenues required to support the government—their annual contribution to the revenues of the State being less by $12,000 than the cost yearly to our people of supporting the Chinese criminals in the State. It is estimated that the criminal classes among them rate as seven to one, and this fact, when considered in connection with the total absence of domestic restraint among the Chinese, and their thoroughly un-American ideas of morals and government, suggests dangers to society and public virtue and order that demand immediate attention. With demands restricted to their simplest animal needs, freed from the cost of domestic life and the burdens of government, they have been placed upon vantage-ground as competitors with American laborers, and have succeeded in obtaining exclusive control of certain industries in California.

They construct the railroads and other works of improvement, occupy the fields of placer mining and agriculture, fill the places of domestic servants, and have absorbed the work and business of manufacturers in certain interests. The effect of their presence and influence has been to exclude and retard desirable immigration from Europe and the States east of the Mississippi River; to produce great distress among American laborers; to inspire a profound irritation and discontent among the citizens of all classes, and to create finally among us an alarming apprehension of the still greater dangers that threaten to spring from this source. In corroboration of the truthfulness of the picture I have drawn of our condition, and as an expression of the views entertained on this subject by the working classes of our State, I submit a memorial presented to Congress, and signed by seventeen thousand of the workingmen of California. I introduce this memorial further to show that this movement is indorsed not by the ignorant and vicious, but by the intelligent and law-abiding citizens of California:

PETITION.

The petition of the undersigned citizens, resident in the State of California, respectfully shows:

That your petitioners view with great alarm the systematic importation and immigration of Chinese laborers into the United States to be employed at rates of wages ruinous to the free labor of our citizens.

That the vast sums granted by Congress in bonds and public lands to aid in the construction of transcontinental railways are perverted to the employment of this debased Asiatic labor while thousands of our own citizens in all parts of the Republic are destitute of work.

That your petitioners cannot regard such a misdirection of the revenues collected from the industry of the people but as a flagrant abuse of the objects contemplated in these munificent grants of the national resources.

That in all future measures of congressional aid provision should be embodied against such abuse, and that supplementary legislation to this end should be provided in the exercise of existing grants.

That our recent history shows with what devotion to the great principles of freedom our citizens placed their lives at the command of the Government and poured out their blood and treasure to terminate the blighting influence of slavery in our midst. Yet an equally and, if possible, a more insidious danger must eventuate by the great increase of this servile population.

That this immigration is in no manner homogeneous with us as a people; that their social wants, habits, and character differ so materially that the standard of labor must be debased to such a degree by their vitiating influence as to repel vast bodies of our most valuable operatives, and not only degrade the social status and moral welfare of our producing classes, but arrest the advancement of our civilization.

That the Asiatic has displaced to a great extent the citizen operatives formerly engaged in the various manufactures of the city of San Francisco, and is rapidly displacing others.

That all occupations giving profitable employment to both male and female have suffered through this cause.

That the aggregate diminution of wages to American citizens cannot be less than $9,000,000 annually.

That the expenditure of such vast industrial resources thus withdrawn from circulation has entailed privation among the working classes, taxed the most generous benevolence, and operated most detrimentally against the prosperity of the city.

That the spread and augmentation of the number throughout the State of California has seriously discouraged the increase of the most desirable class of European immigrants, such additions to our industrial population seeking homes where labor is less degraded or in greater demand.

That your petitioners would urge upon your honorable consideration the necessity of an immediate revision of our treaty relations with China to restrain this overwhelming evil.

That all treaty stipulations should be based on the principle of reciprocal advantages, not mutual privileges. The right or privilege for a citizen of the United States to migrate to China and for a subject of China to migrate to the United States are not mutual in advantages, for it is an advantage to the subject while it is disadvantageous to the citizen to migrate. Hence such provision in the treaty is impolitic and unwise.

That the inundation of incompatible races into the various avenues of labor, which are still so inadequate to supply employment to our own producing classes, must eventually lead to the most disastrous consequences.

That your petitioners are actuated by no illiberal feeling inimical to the less advanced races. On the contrary, it is their earnest desire that all the offices of friendly intercourse should be generously fulfilled; that religious instruction and the advantages of scientific education should be placed at their command; that instead of permitting the unchristian sordidness of our own race using them to degrade the social condition of our people and to desecrate the noblest hopes of our national destiny, we should render them every service to elevate their civilization.

That a cause which projects and accelerates the concentration of wealth, and thus erects in the very bosom of the nation a power destructive of republican institutions, as evidenced by every record of history, and which draws into conflict the millions whose sole dependence and property consist in labor, and therefore sacred to the interests of their families, impeaches equally the justice and wisdom of such a policy.

That we are but in the first stages of this fatal policy.

That its destructive influence on the industrial condition of California is the inevitable result which must follow its extension into every other State of the Union.

That it now be arrested by the foresight and sagacity essential to the guardianship of a great nation, while the delay or neglect of necessary measures will leave the growing antagonism of interests to gather force and ultimately consolidate its power in resistance to the most salutary legislation.

That your petitioners earnestly hope that your honorable body, pre-eminent under the Constitution in its deliberative functions, will not disregard their prayer nor underrate the solemn importance of a subject so grave.

That large numbers of our most valuable operatives have withdrawn from this degrading competition, while others are preparing to abandon a State where a beneficent Providence has spread such immeasurable blessings over its fair villages.

This assuredly demonstrates how limited is governmental knowledge in the administration of Divine bounty, and how much the prosperity of a nation depends on the wisdom of its statesmen

I submit also an estimate of Chinese character, given by a distinguished American citizen, lately deceased, which is entitled to great consideration. Bayard Taylor, in his work entitled "India, China, and Japan," published in 1855, says:

It is my deliberate opinion that the Chinese are, morally, the most debased people on the face of the earth. Forms of vice, which in other countries are barely named, are in China so common that they excite no comment among the natives. They constitute the surface level, and below them are deeps and deeps of depravity so shocking and horrible that their character cannot even be hinted. There are some dark shadows in human nature which we naturally shrink from penetrating, and I made no attempt to collect information of this kind; but there was enough in the things which I could not avoid seeing and hearing, which are brought almost daily to the notice of every foreign resident, to inspire me with a powerful aversion to the Chinese race. Their touch is pollution, and harsh as the opinion may seem, justice to our own race demands that they should not be allowed to settle on our soil. Science may have lost something, but mankind has gained, by the exclusive policy which has governed China during the past century.

This brief historical statement suggests the necessity and supplies the reasons for the legislation recommended by the committee and provided for in the pending bill.

We propose to act in good faith with the government and people of China and to recognize scrupulously any rights acquired under the treaty and exercised according to law. But at the same time, moved by a love for our institutions and a sense of justice to the people of our own State and the States of the Union, we propose to initiate effective measures to correct an existing evil of great magnitude and to avert a danger threatening imminent and most disastrous results to the Pacific States immediately and the whole country ultimately.

The restriction upon the introduction of this population into our midst will be opposed because of its alleged antagonism to the policy of the Government in the matter of foreign immigration and the spirit of our institutions. Under the necessities of a new country, we have sought population, and under the generous influence of free government, we have invited strangers to our shores by a naturalization system most liberal. The immigration sought has always been Caucasian, and the invitation has proceeded upon the presumption that the people who might make up the volume of foreign population should not only be of a class which the American people should deem competent for and entitled to citizenship in the Republic, but such as would from race and religious sentiment desire to become not residents only but citizens of the country, such as would seek refuge from oppression and want a home and find it in America, on the condition that they should adjust themselves to the institutions of the country and become a permanent and homogeneous element in our population. A part of this honorable responsibility that we have assumed in the interest of oppressed people is the exercise of a wide discretion in the introduction of new elements into our population and civilization—such a discretion as will effectually prevent the demoralization of the one and the corruption of the other.

The late modification of the naturalization law that extends its benefits to the African race was not made because population from Africa was desired or expected, but as a necessary incident to the enfranchisement and protection of the millions of Christianized and Americanized people of that race who already were in our midst. The Mongolian, especially the Chinese, unwilling to become a citizen apparently, and essentially incapable of assimilation to our institutions, seeking on our soil a point of trade for profitable money return, (all the benefits of which will accrue to a foreign and distant people,) and specifically denied citizenship by our laws because deemed unworthy of it, was never intended to be the recipient of the benefits embraced in the American policy, so much commended, yet so much misunderstood. There is, therefore, judging the policy and institutions of our people on the question of immigration by the laws and practices of the country, nothing unworthy, ungenerous, or un-American in the pending measure.

Within the limitations that I have suggested and for the reasons stated I appreciate and indorse the great and humane sentiment that this country should be the home of the oppressed and down-trodden of other countries, that it should be the asylum of those who come here to better their condition; and all those who would flee from the iron yoke of despotism to escape tyranny, oppression, and religious persecution shall ever be welcome.

To all such our doors are wide open and our generous laws accord them equal protection with us. We invite them to become citizens, finally to have a voice in our elections and to help make and administer our laws. To such we are ever ready to extend the open hand and welcome them to our political and social franchises and privileges; and far be it from me and the honorable constituency I represent on this floor to shut the doors against any of this class. Our laws not only shelter and protect them while here, but demand for them the same rights and protection accorded to American-born citizens wherever our flag floats, whether on land or sea; and to this end we will, if necessary, use the strong arm of the military and naval forces of the United States.

But I deny that this land is an asylum for that class, who seek our shores for the mere purpose of curiosity or trade, with no appreciation of our free institutions; who refuse to adopt our customs or conform to our habits; who are not devoted to the cause of liberty or equality; who come here simply for purposes of temporary profit, or are brought here as coolies by companies formed in China under contract for servile labor; who refuse to assimilate with us, and who are unfitted by education, habits religious superstition, and by their inborn prejudices to assume any of the duties that society imposes on the citizen. All other countries have shown their appreciation of our institutions by accepting in good faith the generous invitation we have extended to their citizens or subjects. Some of the best citizens of other countries have come here for the purpose of making it their home. Distinguished at home, they have acquired additional honor here. Our history is full of examples of those who have thus occupied positions in both branches of Congress, in the Cabinet, and in almost every branch, civil and military, of our Government.

I do not suppose it will be generally claimed by the opponents of this measure that Congress has not full power to legislate on this subject. The right of Congress is unquestionable.

The only question that may arise in this connection is that of good faith, and of that I shall speak hereafter. I shall quote only one opinion on this point, which I believe to be conclusive of the question. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an opinion of Justice Curtis, of the Supreme Court of the United States, Sanford vs. Scott, 19 Howard's Reports, 629:

By a treaty with a foreign nation the United States may rightfully stipulate that the Congress will or will not exercise its legislative power in some particular manner on some particular subject. Such promises when made should be voluntarily kept with the most scrupulous good faith. But that a treaty with a foreign nation can deprive the Congress of any part of the legislative power conferred by the people, so that it no longer can legislate as it was empowered by the Constitution to do, I more than doubt.

The powers of the Government do and must remain unimpaired. The responsibility of the Government to a foreign nation for the exercise of those powers is quite another matter. That responsibility is to be met and justified to the foreign nation according to the requirements of the rules of public law, but never upon the assumption that the United States had parted with or restricted any power of acting according to its own free will governed by its own appreciation of duty.

The second section of the sixth article is—

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

This has made treaties part of our municipal law, but it has not assigned to them any particular degree of authority, nor declared laws so enacted shall be irrepealable. No supremacy is assigned to treaties over acts of Congress. That they are not perpetual and must be in some way repealable all will agree. If the President and the Senate alone possess the power to repeal or modify a law found in a treaty inasmuch as they can change or abrogate one treaty only by making another inconsistent with the first, the Government of the United States could not act at all to that effect without the consent of some foreign government. I do not consider, I am not aware it has ever been considered, that the Constitution has placed our country in this helpless condition. The action of Congress in repealing the treaties with France by the act of July 7, 1798, (7 Statutes at Large, 578,) was inconformity with these views.

In the case of Taylor vs. Morton (2 Curtis's Circuit Court Reports, 454) I had occasion to consider this subject, and I adhere to the views there expressed.

This is a dissenting opinion in what was popularly known as the Dred Scot case. This opinion, however, was indorsed at that time by the people of one section of this country, and is now recognized as being in accordance not only with the principles of liberty, but the dominant sentiments of the country. I regard it as a fortunate circumstance that I am able to refer to a case that involves the question of freedom and free labor in this country, and I invoke the principles announced in that opinion to justify this House in passing a law that involves the present and future happiness of the citizens of this country as well as the immediate settlement of a question that involves the peace and good order of the Pacific coast.

The only restriction to the exercise of the power herein claimed under the Constitution and public law, as inherent in the Government of the United States, is in the contingency suggested by Justice Curtis, in which the United States may have for reasons satisfactory to it bound itself not to use its powers in a given direction. There is nothing in the treaty with China that indicates a relinquishment of power on our part, and there cannot therefore be a reasonable ground upon which this Congress should decline to take jurisdiction and action upon the subject of discussion.

A consideration of the structure of treaties between foreign powers, and emphatically the treaty with China, will show that such instruments indicate the purposes toward each other of the contracting parties, but do not even suggest generally, much less prescribe, the specific action that each shall take to enforce the purposes declared. The methods by which treaties are enforced are questions of administration, and are left to the discretion and judgment of the several parties thereto. This quality of treaties would seem to be necessary in order to preserve the political integrity and independence of the several sovereignties interested, while at the same time it is expedient, in view of the better knowledge of local conditions possessed by the power that claims and exercises this discretion.

In determining the measure to which this discretionary power may be exercised by Congress reference must be had to the declared purpose of the treaty and to the scope of the municipal laws currently in operation in the country. Up to this extent there is no restriction upon the action of the United States Government, and for this end both general and special laws may be enacted and enforced. The proposed introduction of any objectionable population, whether pauper, criminal, cooly, or any other class who may be deemed dangerous and undesirable by the people, will furnish appropriate and sufficient occasion for the interposition and action of the Government.

We have enacted naturalization laws that discriminated against the Mongolian as a race, we have enacted laws against the cooly trade that discriminates against them as a specific class of population, and the great State of New York is now, by memorial of her people, seeking to re-enact under national jurisdiction and authority a system of legislation once in force under State authority for a period of thirty years, by which it is proposed to regulate the matter of immigration, through the imposition of a per capita tax on the immigrant, or impositions of guarantee-bonds upon the officers or owners of the vessels that bring immigrants to our shores.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the pending measure is of the same class, in principle, with this general legislation sought by New York, but is supplemental and rendered necessary thereto to meet social and industrial conditions of the Pacific States and to relieve us of a danger that grows out of these conditions. If objection is made by gentlemen that this measure is exceptional and not in accord with the established policy of the Government on the subject of immigration, we reply that the restrictions proposed to be placed upon the Chinese aliens who have cursed California by their advent are in accordance with the discrimination against them in the naturalization and cooly laws, and recognized in the treaty itself.

Hence the measure cannot be opposed to the policy of the Government or in violation of the provisions of the existing treaty between the two countries. A vague impression exists in the minds of some gentlemen that in the matter of emigration the Chinese stand on the same plane with the most favored nations, and enjoy equality of rights with them. This impression proceeds upon a total misapprehension of the provision of our treaty with China, and a reference to the fifth and sixth articles of the treaty will sustain the conclusion I have reached and now state. In the fifth article the right of free migration and emigration is recognized; but, as is evident by reference to the concluding clause of this article, the word "free" is used as the opposite of "involuntary," and does not convey nor is intended to convey the idea or the right of unrestricted introduction of the Chinese into this country, nor does it debar the United States, by legislation or otherwise, from limiting and regulating the volume of this people that may seek our shores.

Further consideration confirms the intepretation that I have placed on the fifth article of the treaty with China, and will show beyond a peradventure the character and extent of the right recognized. What is recognized? "The inalienable right" inherent in both the Chinese subject and American citizen of free "migration and emigration." Take notice that this is not a right originating in the treaty, but inalienable and inherent; is not a right belonging to the empire of China, but to a subject of that empire; and a right not belonging to him as a Chinese subject, but as a man—a natural right belonging to all men.

The right of the person, Chinese or American, whatever it may be, is naturally and equally recognized by the two governments, and it cannot be given a meaning and significance in the one case that does not equally apply to the other. I repeat, what is the right recognized in the phrase "free migration and emigration?" Does it mean that each party in question possesses the inalienable right of voluntary in contradistinction to coerced migration and emigration from one to the other country? This would seem to be the meaning of the word "free," and the latter section of the article sustains this signification. Does it mean by free, unlimited, and unrestricted emigration that the several governments themselves cannot and will not impose any restriction on the volume of population that may attempt and seek to move from one country to the other? This cannot be the import of the word or phrase, because China excludes all migration from some of its territory. It permits immigrants only to land at certain ports of the empire. An unlimited volume of emigration at the will of the parties was certainly not contemplated by China.

There is an additional and further view of this article which is conclusive of this question and unanswerable.

The article under consideration contains two sentences. The first contains the recognition of a right, and the second the guarantee of the right mutually recognized by the two governments. The two sentences of this article not only interpret but measure each other—no more, no less. Whatever right is recognized applies to the population alike of each land, and the respective governments agreed, under the sanction of a treaty, to protect it. "What is guaranteed?" Voluntary migration and emigration in opposition to involuntary. "It is agreed and guaranteed by the two governments that emigration shall be free" and not coerced, or, in other words, not "cooly" in its character.

This is the full significance of the guarantee, which not only determines but measures the right confirmed. There is, therefore, I repeat, nothing in the article that precludes such legislative and administrative limitation, out of the volume of Mongolian population who may seek our shores, as the sentiments and interests of the country may make desirable and necessary.

By reference to the sixth article, which confers certain rights upon Chinese subjects equally with the most favored nations, it will be found that the provision does not refer to the introduction of this alien population, but only to their rights after they shall have reached our shores. It does not confer any rights of immigration at all, but deals with them after they shall become residents; securing them, simply and only, "rights of residence and travel" similar and equal to those of the most favored nations. I affirm that not only does the United States possess the power to legislate adequately on this subject, not only has it heretofore legislated in this direction, but the contemplated measure is in strict harmony with the policy of the Government, and perfectly consistent with the provisions of existing treaties and the good faith upon which said treaties proceed.

We urge this measure in the interest of society, for the preservation of the purity, order, and prosperity of the intelligent communities that make up the great commonwealths of our free Republic. Wise statesmanship proposes that the civilization and prosperity of the country shall depend upon a population entitled to citizenship and qualified therefor, and should provide that this citizenship shall be protected and matured in its excellencies by the sanctity of the marital relations and the restraints of domestic life.

Any conception of the American Republic that would truthfully accord with either the quality or measure of our national greatness must rest the success of the Republic upon its citizens, and not upon its alien population, and must glorify and honor the citizen by conceiving of him as the center of an American home. This people, by the deliberate judgment of the American Government, is pronounced unworthy of citizenship, and everything forecasting and characterizing their advent and presence here shows that they lack every element that enters into American home life—aliens, not to be trusted with political rights, and utterly as a class devoid either of the personal or social qualities that make them a reliable and desirable element, possessing industry and economy that may make them peers of the ants, but possessing no elements that make them valuable in building up either the social or industrial interests of the country.

We support this measure in behalf of the industrial development of the Pacific States. A homogeneous, intelligent, patriotic, and Americanized population is a necessity to our section. We need them, and invite them to come into our midst. Now, sir, this alien element not only substitutes and excludes—to the measure of its volume—the class of American and foreign emigration we seek, but by the settled aversion to these aliens, inspired by their servile condition, their filthy habits, and their personal debasement generally, and by the cheapness of their labor, under the monopolistic agencies that control it, American population, from the East, North, and South, is deterred from coming among us. As free labor shunned the healthful, opulent States of the South because of the prejudice to slavery so this element will equally effectually drive back the better classes of workers who would otherwise seek our States; the unequal competition and the degraded contact are alike dreaded and will each be shunned.

We advocate the proposed bill, finally, in the interest of the workingmen of our own section and of our whole land, because the limitation to the introduction of this debased element is not only necessary to their immediate protection in many localities, but the measure involves a principle of law and equity which it may be needful to invoke hereafter in behalf of the men upon whose honest toil the prosperity and advancement of the country so largely depend.

But I suggest, as pertinent to this discussion, that in order to bring relief to the workingmen of the country they shall be protected by legitimate legislation not only against contact but competition with the paupers and criminals of other lands.

In the construction of the impost system, from which the revenues to support Government are mainly derived, the tariff of duties imposed on foreign productions refers directly to the financial needs of the Government; but in determining the rate of duties reference is distinctly had also to the protective influence of such tariff upon the industrial interests of the country. Another and important factor in determining the application of our revenue system is the right of protection of the American laborer against the competition of the pauper classes, who so largely produce the articles from which the imposts are levied and collected. The taxes are heavy, and by some alleged to be unequal and oppressive; but we submit, as a sufficient answer to all objections, that the system, if at fault in minor detail, is based upon a sound philosophy, just in principle and vindicated in its results; that if temporary hardships exist in individual cases or classes, the measure is justified because it will bring ultimately cheaper prices than could otherwise be obtained, and that in the mean time it guarantees the creation and permanent vigor of certain great essential industries on our own soil and under our own jurisdiction, alike necessary to national greatness and independence, and that, finally, it protects the workers of the land against an otherwise degrading and destructive competition, and thus builds up not only industrial prosperity, but social order and public content.

Now, sir, if a radical and sudden change should occur in our system of revenue, a disastrous blow would be struck at the interests of all the great commercial and manufacturing commonwealths in the land, and society and the individual would in many prosperous communities stagger under the stroke. This condition of things would be a deplorable misfortune to the entire country, and those who should produce it would be guilty of a great folly and wrong. Permit me to suggest that while gentlemen who represent the honorable and valuable interests I have referred to are guarding their front they are liable to a more disastrous attack from the rear. The danger to our manufacturing interest will not come from European competition and population, but from those of Asia; and the point of attack is not on the Atlantic, but on the Pacific coast. China can spare ten millions of hardy, industrious paupers, and, under present legislation and administration on this subject, it is only a question of time as to the period that shall mark their coming.

From this overflowing hive, under auspices and agencies similar to those by which our people have been overrun by these aliens, they can be moved in disturbing volume to every section of the Union. They can establish factories first in the Pacific States and then farther East upon a system that brings little or no revenue to the Government, no increase of prosperity or comfort to the communities in which they settle, and can proceed, for the reasons heretofore given, to establish a competition against both American products and American workmen, before which both will fall and disappear. This somber picture may become a reality; and our present inaction in the direction of restrictive legislation against the influx of Mongolians upon our soil invites and renders practicable every evil I have endeavored fairly to depict. In the interest of American productions and American producers, I implore this honorable body to interpose and avert these threatening ills.

The proposed measure affects the interests of the whole country and the rights of citizens of every political party. It is not a partisan measure, nor will I lower the subject by urging it upon partisan grounds. But, owing to the fact that the other side have made this the subject of a party caucus, with the expectation of driving a sufficient number of republicans from its support, that it will endanger the success of the bill, with a view of giving to the other side a partisan advantage, but which will be understood by the people on the Pacific coast, and will be regarded as a cheap method of bolstering up the waning fortunes of the democratic party in California—I say in view of these facts, I may with propriety allude to gentlemen of this body who agree with me in political sentiment in view of the record of the republican party on the rights of the workingmen of America.

The republican party was born amid the contending and opposing forces of freedom and slavery, baptized in the bloody conflict waged against freedom and free labor in the then Territory of Kansas, nurtured and reared in manhood amid the throes of civil war—a war, sir, waged by one party for the purpose of extending the institution of slavery in the free Territories of the Republic and riveting more closely the shackles of human bondage upon four millions of its people; conducted, on the other hand, by those who looked upon the institution of slavery as the enemy of free labor and indeed the common enemy of all our institutions.

The conflict resulted not only in the preservation of the integrity of the institutions and soil of the Republic, but in the destruction of the institution of slavery, in the elevation of labor by removing from every class of toilers the stigma of servility. The republican party has not only dignified labor by its work of emancipation and enfranchisement, but by putting in operation a wise and equitable homestead system, available to the humblest citizen, it is possible for the workingmen of our country to become independent and comfortable, and individual labor self-sustaining and self-respectful. With such a record as a party on the question of labor, I may appeal with confidence to gentlemen who share my political opinions to give the pending measure favorable consideration.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say this movement for protective legislation against Mongolian emigration is one of great unanimity among my constituents. It has extended to every county, possessed every public journal, and thoroughly mastered the public sentiment of all our communities. It does not originate in prejudice, but springs from matured thought and is the result of a settled conviction among our people. It rests upon grave and weighty considerations that address themselves to the sober and best judgments of the whole country, and unless some adequate action is taken by this honorable body the destroying evils that immediately threaten us will speedily extend their shadows over the more densely populated States of the West, North, and South.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from California near me, [Mr. LUTTRELL.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I ask consent that any member of the House who desires may have permission to print in the RECORD remarks touching the bill now under consideration.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. LUTTRELL addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, twice before in our history we have been called upon to determine questions arising from the difference of races. Our first experience was with the red race. Millions of money and thousands of valued lives have been sacrificed in the vain effort to make the Indian either an obedient subject or a willing citizen. He is to-day the same sullen, unconquered alien savage that he was in the earliest colonial history of our country. The "Indian policy" is as much a vexed problem of legislation in this as it has been in every preceding Congress since the organization of our Government.

Our next experience was with the black race. Need I recall the bitter animosities, the sectional strife, the political and religious dissensions which marked its progress, until the problems which the wisest statesmanship had failed to solve were finally determined by the arbitrament of arms?

And now before our trials and difficulties with the red and black races are fully ended we are invited to another and even more difficult experiment with the yellow race. If our experience has been a failure, or at best a doubtful success, with the African and the Indian, what can we expect from the Mongolian, who has neither the docility and humility of the one, nor the consciousness of inferior civilization which distinguishes the other. The bill which is now before the House puts an end to this third experiment with an alien race. Avoiding the example of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] I will confine myself to the merits of the bill. As to its terms it hardly needs any explanation. It proposes after the 1st of next July, under penalty of fine or imprisonment, to restrict the number of Chinese immigrants to fifteen for every vessel coming to this country.

But two questions are involved in the passage of the bill: have we the constitutional right to enact such a law? and, if so, ought we in this instance to exercise that right?

Upon the first of these questions the decisions which have just been read from the report are, it seems to me, conclusive. A treaty under the Constitution is not more sacred or binding than a law. The last expression of the legislative mind, whether by treaty or by law, is the controlling one. If, therefore, Congress passes this bill the Burlingame treaty, as far as it conflicts with its provisions, will become null and void. Admitting, then, the right, a right not founded upon any doctrine of higher law, but based upon the principles and precedents of the Constitution, the next and more practical question is, shall we exercise it? Is it good policy? Is it expedient or necessary to enact a restrictive law of this kind? Do the facts justify it?

The first fact to which I would call the attention of the House is that wherever the Chinese have gone the judgment of condemnation against them is almost unanimous. The States of our own country in which they have secured a foothold have been pronounced and often violent in their opposition. Their governors have issued messages and proclamations, their Legislatures have enacted laws, their courts have rendered judgments, the avowed object and purpose of which were to put an end to Chinese immigration. There are to-day in the hands of our committee the joint resolutions of four State Legislatures, the memorial of the constitutional convention of California, passed only a few days ago without a single dissenting voice, together with the proceedings of innumerable societies, religious bodies, labor conventions, and the petitions of over one hundred thousand private citizens, setting forth from different stand-points the evils of Chinese immigration, and urging upon Congress the necessity for prompt and vigorous measures of relief.

When it is borne in mind that the people of these States were not at first hostile to the Chinese, but on the contrary welcomed them as valued allies in the development of their material resources, the weight of this adverse testimony is greatly increased. If, as is contended for by some, the Chinese make useful citizens and worthy members of society, why this unanimous desire to get rid of them. If the evil of their presence did not exceed, did not far outrun the good, would not self-interest join with justice to prevent such a result. As it is, the free, unprejudiced, and deliberate judgment of so many different communities, not confined to any one but held by all classes, is certainly worthy of the gravest and most careful consideration. And especially, Mr. Speaker, should it be respected when it is confirmed and enforced by that of every country in the world where the Chinese have found a lodgment. In Java, in Siam, in Singapore, in the Phillipine Islands, and in the Australian colonies, as has been shown by my esteemed friend from California, [Mr. DAVIS,] the same opposition has been aroused and the same results realized long ago which we to-day see upon the Pacific slope. Everywhere they have made themselves obnoxious; everywhere heavy penalties and restrictive legislation have been found necessary means of protection. In Java the Chinese have lived for hundreds of years, but this long residence has neither diminished nor destroyed the objectionable features of their character. Years ago they were declared by the official authorities to be a very dangerous people, a pest to the country, for which the only remedy was their expulsion. We are not, therefore, the only people who object to the Chinese.

Nor, Mr. Speaker, if we pass this bill will we be the only nation that has set aside a treaty which worked injury and injustice to its citizens. Both France and England have treaties with China which, like our own, provide for free immigration, but neither government has hesitated to impose special taxes and restrictions upon them. As far back as 1855 the English colony of Victoria levied a capitation tax of $50 upon every Chinese immigrant. In 1861 a similar tax was imposed by the colony of New South Wales, and in 1877 by the colony of Queensland and also by the French colony of Saigon. We, sir, may well profit by the older and riper experience of these countries. If restrictive laws have been found necessary and have proved successful with them, why should we not use the same means for our own protection?

The briefest inquiry, Mr. Speaker, into the reasons for such legislation will show both its propriety and its necessity. The Chinaman, whether as a laborer, as a member of society, or of the body-politic, is an undesirable and dangerous element in any community. Crowded, huddled together, forty or fifty in a room not larger than would accommodate with decency and with comfort one man with a family, discarding or disregarding all the usual ordinary appliances of personal civilization as to diet and clothing, cooking, eating, and sleeping in the same apartments, they have succeeded in reducing the cost of living to its minimum and thus wherever located have forced the laboring classes to the wall. As laborers, therefore, the Chinese can only exist to the exclusion or degradation of all others in the community.

Nor as members of society are they less objectionable. The personal habits consequent upon their mode of life in these squalid dens, their low groveling ideas of virtue and religion, and their peculiar social views have been commented upon and condemned by every nation with whom they have come in contact.

As members of the body-politic the complaints against them have been equally strong and widespread. Nearly fifty years ago we find the government of Java complaining that they form a distinct class, refusing to mingle with or be absorbed by the society around them; preserving their own costume, their own habits, traditions, social organization, and nationality.

These objections to the Chinese, Mr. Speaker, whether from an industrial, social, or political stand-point, are worthy of serious consideration in any community. In a self-governing one, however, such as ours, they deserve especial attention. Here, if anywhere, it should be the aim of the Government, of its legislative representatives, to elevate the dignity and preserve the self-respect of all of its citizens. As are the people so will be the government. If the people are corrupt, if they are ignorant, selfish, or unpatriotic, the government will reflect these ignoble traits in its own features.

The introduction, therefore, of a class of men like the Chinese, who are without homes or families, whose education and habits disqualify them for citizenship, whose cheap wages degrade labor, and whose want of morality and self-respect unfit them for society, is fraught with great danger to our republican institutions, and should be promptly and effectually checked.

We say in theory to our citizens that they are to be protected in all their rights and privileges; we say to them in theory that the Government respects and honors labor—honors the bone and sinew of the land. How, then, can we hope to secure a bold, defiant, independent citizenship among the laboring-men who comprise four-fifths of our population if we declare to them by our conduct, by our practical legislation that these generous theories are but myths, but glittering generalities? Shall we subject them to a competition—to a mode of life—that will make these grand and inspiring truths utter impossibilities? Shall we say to them that the rights and honors of American citizenship are one thing, and their possession, their enjoyment another and a different thing? Shall we, in other words, compel any class of our fellow-citizens to surrender church, home, and school to become mere "hewers of wood and drawers of water," by subjecting them to the shame and degradation which curse the Chinese laborer?

I hope and believe that no such declaration will ever go forth from this body, but that we will recognize the equal rights and dignity of all of our citizens by the prompt passage of this bill.

Such a result is demanded by political no less than by industrial considerations. We welcome to our shores all who desire or intend to make this their home or who expect to become permanent citizens of our Government. The German, the Irish, the French, and other immigrants to our country have quickly and successfully adapted themselves to our institutions. Prompt to defend the honor and to promote the interests of their adopted land, yielding ready and cheerful obedience to its laws and customs, they have illustrated in their lives and vindicated by their conduct the wise policy of immigration. As kindred drops of water they have mingled and been lost in the great stream of American life. The Chinese have no such intention or experience. They do not come to seek homes. They disdain to accept our institutions; they look with contempt upon our social customs; they defy the authority of our laws; they retain all the distinctive features and characteristics of their national life. Twenty-five years of residence and contact with our people have left them unchanged and unimproved in any important particular. The argument, therefore, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] bases upon a comparison of this race with our Irish and German fellow-citizens is utterly without foundation. The Chinese, unlike them, have always been and will always be an alien element in our midst. We want no such indigestible substance in the body-politic. We want a brave, patriotic, self-reliant, assimilative citizenship.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate under the operation of the previous question has expired.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] whether he will not permit an amendment which would be a notice to the Chinese government that when this bill goes into effect, that is, on the 1st of July——

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has no power to admit amendments.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I am not at liberty to admit any amendment.

Mr. PAGE. Then I ask unanimous consent for an amendment providing that notice be given to the Chinese government that the fifth and sixth articles of the treaty shall be abrogated on and after a certain day.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the most intelligible mode of voting on the amendments of the committee will be to read each section of the bill in its order, and then, in connection with each section, the amendments relating thereto. The first section will now be read.

The first section of the bill was read, as follows:

That no master of any vessel owned in whole or in part by a citizen of the United States or by a citizen of any foreign country, shall take on board such vessel, at any port of the Chinese Empire, or at any other foreign port or place whatever, any number exceeding ten Chinese passengers, whether male or female, with the intent to bring such passengers to the United States, or shall bring such passengers to any number exceeding ten on one voyage within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows, and severally agreed to:

In line 5, after the word "country," insert the words "nor other person;" after the word "port," in line 6, strike out the word "of," and in lieu thereof insert "or place within;" in line 7, strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" and in line 10, strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen."

The second section was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That whenever the master of any such vessel takes on board the same, at any foreign port or place, any greater number of Chinese passengers than is prescribed in the first section of this act, with intent to bring such passengers to the United States, or bring such passengers to any number exceeding ten on one voyage within the jurisdiction of the United States, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for each passenger so taken on board or brought within the jurisdiction of the United States exceeding the number of ten, be fined $100, and may also be imprisoned for not exceeding six months.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

In line 1, after the word "master," insert "or other person in charge;" in line 7 strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" and in line 11 strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen."

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to ask unanimous consent, and I hope I shall have the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky who has reported the bill, to make an exception to the provisions of section 2 excepting travelers and diplomatic representatives coming to the United States or passing through our territory, or students visiting the United States for the purposes of education.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I object, because they would send diplomatic representatives and students by every steamer.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 were read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the master of any vessel arriving in the United States, or any of the Territories thereof, from any foreign place whatever, at the same time that he delivers a manifest of the cargo, and if there be no cargo, then at the time of making report or entry of the vessel pursuant to law, shall, in addition to the other matters required to be reported by law, deliver and report to the collector of the district in which such vessel shall arrive a separate list of all Chinese passengers taken on board the vessel at any foreign port or place, and of all such passengers on board the vessel at that time; such list shall be sworn to by the master in the same manner as directed by law in relation to the manifest of the cargo, and the refusal or neglect of the master to comply with the provisions of this section shall receive the same penalties, disabilities, and forfeitures as are provided for a refusal or neglect to report and deliver a manifest of the cargo.

SEC. 4. That the amount of the several penalties imposed by the foregoing provisions shall be liens on the vessels violating those provisions, and such vessel shall be libeled therefor in any circuit or district court of the United States where such vessel shall arrive.

The SPEAKER. No amendment has been proposed by the committee to those sections.

The fifth section of the bill was read as follows:

SEC. 5. That informers shall be entitled to one-half of any penalty or fine collected under the provisions of this act upon their information.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the committee is to strike that section out.

Mr. CONGER. I ask Mr. Speaker that a provision be inserted in place of section 5, so as not to prevent the arrival on the coast of the United States of Chinese embassies or Chinese officers.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I object.

Mr. CONGER. As objection has been made I will modify my amendment so as to provide that ministers and their suites from China shall be excepted from the provisions of this bill.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I object. We want this bill passed and the gentleman from Michigan does not.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The next section of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 6. That nothing herein contained shall be held to repeal or modify any law forbidding the importation of coolies, or of females for immoral purposes, into the United States: Provided, That no consul or consular agent of the United States residing at any port from which any vessel taking Chinese passengers may take her departure shall grant the certificate provided for in section 2162 of the Revised Statutes for more than ten Chinese passengers on any one vessel.

The pending amendment moved by the committee was to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen."

Mr. CONGER. I ask that a proviso be attached to this section that it shall not apply to shipwrecked Chinese who may be brought from the islands of the Pacific to the coast of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to receiving that amendment?

Mr. CONGER. My amendment is that this shall not apply to the bringing of shipwrecked Chinese from islands where they may have been cast away into the first port they may arrive at on our coast.

Mr. COX, of New York. I object to the amendment. There will be no difficulty on the score of humanity.

Mr. CONGER. I ask who objects to my amendment?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I do not object to the shipwrecked Chinese, but I want the bill passed, and these amendments are only made to delay its passage.

Mr. CONGER. Who objects to the shipwrecked Chinese?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] object.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect from and after the 1st day of September, 1878.

The amendments of the committee were to strike out "September" and insert "July" and to strike out "eight" and insert "nine."

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to offer an amendment that this bill shall not take effect until due notice has been given to China according to the usages of international law of the termination of the treaty against which it is a palpable and flat violation.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. My amendment will be received unless this bill is merely for party capital.

Mr. COX, of New York. I object, unless I have a chance to answer the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will see no debate takes place out of order.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The clerk will read the bill a third time.

Mr. CONGER. Has the bill been engrossed?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. CONGER. Perhaps it had better be engrossed; and while it is being engrossed, we may have further time to debate its provisions.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to adjourn.

Mr. LUTTRELL. And I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw the demand for the reading of the engrossed bill if the House is to adjourn. I wanted to use the time in debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought the gentleman wanted the engrossed bill, as that is what he stated.

Mr. CONGER. While the bill was being engrossed I wished the time taken up in discussion; but if that cannot be done I withdraw my demand.

The bill was then read the third time.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I now demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. COX, of New York, and Mr. CONGER demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 72, not voting 61; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 623) to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the District of Columbia, so as to make the 22d day of February a holiday within said District; and

A bill (S. No. 1151) to amend section 5497 of the Revised Statutes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a resolution providing for the printing of 10,000 copies of the special report from the Department of Agriculture on the insects affecting the cotton-plant.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 27) providing for transportation by the military authorities of John J. Manuel and two infant daughters from Camp Howard, Idaho Territory, to Saint Charles, Missouri.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6143) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes. The Clerk will read the pending paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation by railroad, $8,715,310: Provided, That the runs or routes of railway post-office clerks, route agents, railway post-office cars, or apartments, shall not fix the termini of railroad routes under the act of March 3, 1873; and that hereafter no more than one separate and independent post-route or railroad route shall be established and paid for over any one railroad for a greater distance than ten miles in any case.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out in lines 53 and 54 the words "$8,715,310," and inserting, in lieu thereof, "$9,000,000." My reason for moving this amendment is the fact that the sum of $8,715,310 will, in the judgment of the Post-Office Department, leave a necessary deficiency for this item. The sum of $9,000,000 is recommended as being the least that will be sufficient to cover this branch of the service.

The committee on Saturday increased the appropriation for the star service, and it is necessary to increase the appropriation also of what is known as the railway service. There are three reasons why it is important that this appropriation should be increased. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, the cost for the transportation of the mails was $8,470,144. The bill appropriates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, only two hundred and forty-eight or two hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars more. There will be an increase for the year 1880 over the year 1878 of four thousand in the number of miles of railroad lines which, at a cost of $50 per mile, will make an increase of not less than $200,000. There will also be an increased expense, and it is estimated at not less than $100,000 for the cost of reweighing of this service, and in addition to that an addition to third-class mail matter now registered.

Now, Congress has greatly enlarged the amount of mail matter of the third class, and the result will be that a very large proportion of the packages weighing pounds and under, which have heretofore been transported by express companies, will now be sent by mail. My judgment is that it will require an increase of not less than $100,000 to meet the wants of this service. I have a carefully prepared letter, written to me since this bill was reported to the House, prepared in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, giving the reasons why this is necessary, and I will ask to have read the portion I have marked.

Mr. RYAN obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. BAKER, of Indiana.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to say in reference to the increase that the articles transported through the mails are of all sorts imaginable. For the purpose of illustrating this I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the portion of the letter to which I have referred from the postmaster at Fort Yuma, Arizona, to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

The Clerk read as follows:

One package iron-bound stirrups.

One telegraph battery.
Twelve packages hardware.
Five bundles of slippers.
One bag of potatoes, supposed to be for seed.
One iron coupling for two-inch gas-pipe.
Two boxes candy.
Ten four-pound boxes (tin) tea, broken and contents strewn among the mail.
Two bundles dry goods.
Three bundles boots and shoes.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. It is everything, from a pair of boots and shoes up to a horse-shoe, that is now transported through the mails, and so long as the Post-Office Department is required to transport this matter it is important that Congress shall vote money essential to the service. The registration of this sort of matter is ordered, and gentlemen can readily see the pressure which has existed thus far since the law went into effect in October. This branch of the service has been increased.

I will state that the item of eight cents paid for registration more than compensates for the expense, but the money is covered into the Treasury, and if that item could be appropriated for the service of the Department it would in a large measure decrease the necessity for this appropriation.

I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read as part of my remarks a letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1879.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry of this morning, whether $8,714,424 would be sufficient to cover the cost of transportation by railroad for other than railway post-office cars for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, I beg leave to explain that the appropriations for all items of transportation by railroad for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, is $9,550,000 The cost of the railway post-office service on the 31st December, 1878, was at the rate of $1,084,856, which leaves $8,470,144 to cover the cost for the weight of mails to June 30, 1878. Deducting this sum, $8,470,144, from the sum you mentioned, $8,714,424, leaves a balance of $244,280 to cover all increase of cost for other than railway post-office cars for the year ending June 30, 1880. It is estimated that there will be not less than four thousand (and probably more) miles of new railroad built during the fiscal year of 1880. (See letter to you of January 15, 1879, giving statistics of new service for 1877, 1878, and 1879.) This at $50 per mile would amount to $200,000. Then there is additional cost arising from a reweighing of the mails in the regular contract divisions each year. The division to be readjusted from July 1, 1879, comprises the States of Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Missouri. In addition to this it is necessary to weigh the mails on certain routes in other States. For instance, the leading lines out of New York were weighed and payment readjusted from January 1, 1878, and the result was an increase of cost on account of increased weight of over $100,000 per annum. Considering the rapid increase in the weight of mails carried, it is more than probable that the present adjustment of pay cannot be maintained beyond 1st January, 1880, which would cover a period of two full years. And there are other routes on which it is necessary to reweigh the mails in order to deal fairly and justly with the companies.

In presenting this statement I desire simply to express to you, and through you to the committee, that it is my opinion that the sum of $8,714,424 will be altogether insufficient to cover the cost of the railroad service, apart from the cost of railway post-office cars, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and that to avoid a deficiency or embarrassment to the service the appropriation should not be less than $9,000,000.

I inclose herewith a table showing the expenses of the Post-Office Department, so far as audited, for the quarter ending September 30, 1878. It is proper to explain with regard to the cost of the railroad service that some accounts are not yet adjusted, and that the amount due for all, or nearly all, of the new service ordered since July 1, 1878, is not included in the $2,325,608.11 reported as paid, as the rates have not yet been ascertained.

Very respectfully, &c.,

THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. H. BAKER,
House of Representatives.

Mr. REAGAN. Where did the gentleman obtain that information?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. It was furnished by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General at my request.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, it is almost impossible, under the five-minute rule, to review the speech of the gentleman or the long letter read here. I must be exceedingly brief.

The Committee on Appropriations found in the year 1878 that the appropriations as compared with the year 1877 had increased 500 or 600 per cent. They found on examination that 2¾ per cent. of that increase was attributable to the increase of the postal-car service.

I have a letter, which I will print as a part of my remarks, comparing the service of the year 1878 with the year 1879, with the estimate from the Department, which shows that the estimate of the Department as to the service of the current fiscal year exceeds that heretofore made by 4.15 per cent.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1879.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal request, I have the honor to submit that the cost of the railroad service to June 30, 1878, as audited, is $9,553,035 per annum.

The amount appropriated, in all, for 1879 is $9,550,000. Add to this the decrease by the abatement of 5 per cent. $400,000, and the cost for 1879 will be $9,950,000, which is 4.15 per cent. over the audited cost for 1878.

It is proper to note in this connection that of the cost for 1878, $100,337.27 was from increase occasioned by increase in the weight of mails on the great lines from January 1, 1878. See letter to you from this office dated December 13, 1878. As a similar increase in the cost, for the same reason on the same lines, is more than probable before the expiration of the fiscal year 1880, the estimates for 1880 should, therefore, be made with some reference to this probability.

A tabular statement is submitted showing the amounts paid out of the $150,000 appropriated by act of March 3, 1877. Between the figures given last year in the table of the amount to be paid, &c., and the figures given in this table there is a slight difference, which, as explained to you personally, is attributable to an inaccuracy in the mathematical operation through which the results given in the table of last year were obtained.

Very respectfully, &c.,

THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. H. BLOUNT,
House of Representatives.

Now, the Department asks an increase of 8 per cent. in this fiscal year.

The gentleman from Indiana misapprehends, as the House will see, the purport of the letter. Then the letter declares that there will be an increase of four thousand miles during this year, and there is an increase in the building of railroads every year, which the gentleman omits to state.

In 1877, 1878, and 1879, and more or less every year that was the case, so likewise we may add in reference to mails they reweigh every year.

I cannot concur in the practice of the Department to reweigh the mails every year on the great trunk railways. The law on that subject requires that the mails must be reweighed once in every four years. They are reweighed on these lines in the business seasons of the year and in every season on the great lines.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, I move to strike out the last word.

Having twelve hundred or thirteen hundred miles of railway in my district, and that being a pretty fair sample of the West generally, and as there is a considerable amount of new road about being completed, I feel an interest in this matter specially on behalf of my own people and generally on behalf of the people of the whole country.

In regard to this branch of the service, I call the attention of the House to the fact that there can be no cheating in it. I agree that there ought to be liberal appropriations to the star service. Those were made the other day. You can expedite the schedule; you can increase the number of trips; you can put the service on a great many additional routes; but you cannot tell how much it will be till the year closes. Here is a general statute which says what the compensation of railroads shall be; no more and no less. Here is a general law which makes every railroad a post-route. Here is the fact that there is no railroad that is operated which ought not to be a post-route and mail service placed upon it.

Now, sir, I fear if this appropriation is not increased that the service cannot in the latter part of the coming fiscal year be placed on the new roads. If you give them $600 or $800 or a thousand or a million of dollars more, the service could not cost a cent more than if you refuse to give it, provided you put the service on at all, because it can only be so much; that is, according to the weight carried. The gentleman has separated the appropriation for railway transportation from the postal-car appropriation. I think that was wise. The Department was given what it thinks it can get along with for the postal cars.

That was the only place where money could be improperly spent, that is, by putting postal cars on some routes which perhaps did not require them; but in this case the money cannot be improperly spent, because, whether you have one trip or one hundred trips over a railroad within a given time, the pay can be no more and no less than the weight calls for.

If it were not for the expense of weighing the mails, I believe the Government would save a large amount of money by weighing every year. I only wish weighings were three or four times as frequent as they are, because it sometimes happens that one or two years after the weighing the mails upon that route are diverted to some other route; but until a reweighing there can be no change in the pay.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to state that under this bill the percentage of increase as compared with the current year is 5.36 per cent., whereas for the present year as compared with last year it was only 4.15 per cent. I desire to state further that the Postmaster-General has failed to admit in his communication any advantage resulting from the operations of the act of 1876 and the act of 1878 with regard to roads upon which the advantage could not be realized hitherto by reason of contracts which could not be interfered with. The expiration of these contracts will bring into operation these reductions for the next fiscal year. Thus there are $110,000 of which no note is taken at all. The committee in their estimate have allowed an increase of one thousand miles, or about $50,000.

Now, when I find in the readjustment of weights an increase of several hundred thousand dollars, I cannot understand how the Government is benefited by the reweighing of the mails on great lines annually and at the busiest season of the year. If the rates were not enormous already, if they were not already beyond the freight rates to the general public, we might reasonably be asked to waive the protection which the law allows us, and adopt the method of weighing every year and at the busiest season. But under the circumstances, there is nothing in the way of justice that these roads can claim at the hands of the Government.

The committee have made these calculations carefully, and they believe they are correct. The estimates of the Department hitherto have gone very far beyond the actual results. I see nothing at all in the letter which has been read that would justify this House in adding to the appropriation, and especially adding $300,000, making an increase of nearly 9 per cent., when the current year shows an increase of only 4.15 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia has a great deal to say about percentages—a matter which it is quite difficult for me to comprehend. Here is an appropriation which the law itself administers; the law regulates the pay that the railroad companies are to receive for carrying the mails. The officials who administer this appropriation tell us in plain figures just what the cost of this service will be. They do not enter into any calculation about percentages; but they tell us what the cost of the service under the law was last year, and what the increase will be next year, and this increase makes the appropriation reach about the sum of $9,000,000. My friend from Georgia and a majority of the Committee on Appropriations refused last year to take the figures of the Post-Office Department and made up their bill upon his system of percentages. What was the result? He was in the unpleasant predicament of coming in here, before the expiration of the year, with a deficiency bill to the amount of $450,000. And let me tell the gentleman that just so certainly as this appropriation passes at the sum he has fixed, he will next year be confronted with a deficiency of about $300,000.

Why should we hesitate to grant the amount which the Department declares to be necessary for this purpose? Not one dollar can be expended except in accordance with law. The Department has no discretion in administering this appropriation. It is proper, therefore, that we should grant it what it states will be enough. If it is not all used the balance will go back into the Treasury. But the Department shows us by incontrovertible figures that it will require about $9,000,000 to run this service. Therefore I think it wise for this House to appropriate that sum.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] had said less upon the subject of deficiencies during the last Congress we should not have had the spectacle of an utter recklessness on the part of the Department as to the will of this House, not only in the matter of pay to railroads, but in the matter of steamboat transportation and in other branches of the service.

The fact that a deficiency arose in connection with the railway service grew out of an abuse encouraged by the gentleman from Ohio and his prophecy. This House, when it met here this winter, was informed that unless an increased appropriation was made the postal-car service must be abandoned; and the Department undertook to lecture this House upon the subject of deficiencies. But, sir, in the matter of steamboat service, where there was no law requiring the Department to go on as it has done, it has gone forward under the gentleman's prediction recklessly increasing expenditures. In the matter of route agents and postal-car clerks, where there was no law requiring an increase of the service, but on the contrary a law prohibiting it, the Department has gone on in the same spirit. This Department has been as reckless of law and as contemptuous of the will of this House as the Navy Department. It matters not what Congress may do; while the gentleman from Ohio and other gentlemen on that side condemn our policy in restraining the expenditures of the Department and withhold any animadversions upon the conduct of the Department, we shall be met with deficiencies.

There was no occasion for that deficiency. The gentleman's argument is we must take just whatever the Department says. He knows nothing about percentages, but he does know what the Departments ask. That is the argument upon which this House is to act. It is idle for the Committee on Appropriations to meet; it is idle for this House to discuss any proposition in reference to governmental expenditure if the standard of right is to be the estimates of the Departments, and if there is to be found absolute verity. In relation to the service for next year we have prevented in this bill any such increase.

Again, sir, I have already given notice to this House that I shall ask that such sums as may not be necessary for the use of the postal service may be transferred to the payment of service by weight. My impression is that the money appropriated for this postal-car service will not all be needed. The Department says we have the finest postal-car service in the world. An enormous increase has been had. Why should this sum be used? I cannot think it will be necessary. I have had intimations from the Department itself that they do not think so, and have been requested to make this amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I move a pro forma amendment.

I only wish to state one or two facts, Mr. Chairman, in connection with this subject. In 1873 the maximum rate paid for this service was $375 per mile per annum. The maximum rate to-day is over $1,000 per mile per annum. Now, that simple fact it seems to me should be sufficient to put this House on its guard as to further increase of this appropriation.

It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, too, that within this time the railroads have diminished their rates upon freight at least 100 per cent. in many instances, and upon many descriptions of freight over 100 per cent. And yet the Government is called upon to increase the appropriation for the transportation of the mail matter over 300 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask my friend if this is not a matter of law?

Mr. ATKINS. It is a matter of law to some extent.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it not to a great extent?

Mr. ATKINS. But it is more a matter of administration than of law.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask the gentleman to tell me what discretion the Postmaster-General has?

Mr. ATKINS. I might reply to the gentleman right there in reference to a matter he alluded to a moment ago concerning deficiencies, for my friend is a great prophet on the subject of deficiencies——

Mr. FOSTER. And a very sure one.

Mr. ATKINS. He spoke a moment ago of a deficiency we had to supply a few weeks since of $450,000. How was that brought about? Was that brought about by a compliance with the law? No, sir. I disliked to say it when the subject was up before, indeed I moved around the fact which ought really to have been brought out, and I did it simply on personal considerations, but I am bound now to say since the gentleman has called me out that that deficiency was brought about in my opinion by a violation of the spirit of the law by the Postmaster-General in putting on this service in a greater ratio for the first two quarters of the fiscal year than it should have been done. He should have taken that appropriation and applied it proportionately to the entire fiscal year and not to the first two quarters, and in applying it to the first two quarters he violated in my judgment the spirit of the law. I trust the gentleman is answered.

Mr. FOSTER. But he did not violate the law itself.

Mr. ATKINS. What is the difference if the administrative officer violates what he knows to be the intention of the law-makers? It is the same thing.

Mr. Chairman, I trust this House will stop and ponder this question one moment. If the railroads can carry the freight of the country 100 per cent. less than five years ago it does seem to me they should be willing to stop at 300 per cent. increase over what they carried it in some instances for five years ago. For, as I stated at the outset, we are now paying in some instances over $1,000 per mile per annum, when the maximum in 1873 was only $375 per mile per annum.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Now, Mr. Chairman, I confess I am unable to appreciate the force of the argument of my friend from Tennessee. His statement that the average cost of transportation of mails in 1874 was $375 per mile and now the cost reaches the sum of $1,000 has no earthly weight at all in view of the complexion this bill wears as it is brought into the House. If they should receive to-day on some of the roads $1,000 per mile per annum, it is by virtue of the fact there is a law upon the statute-book which not only authorizes but requires the Post-Office Department to award a thousand dollars a mile. If this bill proposed to readjust the rate of compensation for railroad companies in the carriage of mail matter there would be point to the observations of the gentleman from Tennessee.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that in the discussion of plain, practical business questions I am tired beyond all possibility of expression by hearing men clamor about the heads of Departments because they call to our attention the fact we have been niggardly and parsimonious in the appropriation of money for the necessary wants of the service.

This service is a service that the law compels the Post-Office Department to conduct. The law requires that all classes of mail matter offered to be carried shall be carried. The law fixes the compensation that shall be paid to those companies for it; and it is a simple matter of arithmetic that we might as well face now as hereafter whether or not the amount of $9,000,000 is too much for it.

My friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] misapprehended, I perceived, not only what I said in reference to the increase of railroads, but I think he misapprehended the letter as well which was read at the Clerk's desk—the statement in the letter, and in my remarks of which it formed the basis, that with the present average percentage of increase in railroad construction the number of miles of new service that will have to be provided for in 1880 over the present fiscal year will be more than four thousand miles, and that of itself involves at the lowest rate not less than $200,000, while this bill only proposes $244,000 more than was appropriated before a single mile of this additional service was provided for.

The gentleman complains of reweighing the mails. He would have this Government, when it agrees to pay a certain compensation for carrying the mails by weight, delay more than two years the reweighing, in order that it may compel the railroads, by refusing to reweigh, to perform the service without the compensation which, according to the law and fair dealing, they would be entitled to receive. I think the rule adopted by the Department of reweighing mail matter once in two years, in order to readjust the rate of compensation, does not make the weighing any too often, taking into view the fact that our population increases 3 per cent. a year, and that the postal service of the country increases very nearly at the rate of 8 per cent. a year; I mean all the various branches of the service, not selecting out this and that particular one, as the gentleman from Georgia does. The general average is what I have mentioned. These considerations show that it is impossible to get along with less than $9,000,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend from Indiana has as yet failed to discover the fact that there are $110,000 of which he takes no cognizance, under the acts of 1876 and 1878, for the compensation of railroads. Neither does the communication which the gentleman has had read at the Clerk's desk take any notice of it. The gentleman complains that there is a querulous spirit toward the heads of Departments on account of deficiencies. I have already stated the reason we had for complaint in that respect; and before this debate is through we will reach other instances where there has been manifestly a violation of law. Now that the railroad service is paid for at so much, according to weight, there is no pretense at all for going beyond the appropriations, except the absolute will of the official as against the will of this House. I have been careful, sir, I trust, since I have been here, to make no complaint except with just cause. The history of this service during the past year will show that I am correct. And I undertake to say that the administration of the Post-Office Department will prove to be as expensive in its recommendations as any administration of that Department has ever been. I will not say that of all the Departments. It affords me pleasure to commend the gentleman who is at the head of the Navy Department, and who adheres rigidly to law and respects the will of this Congress as formulated in legislation. I regret, sir, that the Post-Office Department is in striking contrast to it.

Gentlemen reiterate here their complaints about the deficit as though it was something unusual. Why, sir, just last winter we appropriated $175,000 on account of the failure on the other side to appropriate money enough for postmasters. In the very first conference committee between the two Houses in the Forty-fourth Congress, it was alleged that in the State of Texas alone six hundred miles of railroad service had not been given by reason of insufficiency of appropriation. Yet gentlemen talk about the deficit here as though it were a novelty, born of the democratic party in this House, when the history of all their own appropriation bills furnishes similar facts.

Sometimes the estimates are too large; sometimes they are too small. Sometimes the appropriations are too large; sometimes they are too small. This is a matter that belongs to all parties; this and nothing more. Why, sir, in the last Congress it is well known that the great deficiency bill that we passed consisted of deficiencies coming over from republican Congresses; I do not know how much of it was right or how much was wrong; deficiencies are always to be found. The calculations and estimates we have made I believe, sir, are correct, and I think this House ought to exercise its own judgment instead of acting under the dictation of the Department.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I move to strike out the last word. We would be led to the conclusion from the discussion here to-day, if we did not know any better, that the Postmaster-General is now paying $1,000 a mile for services that in 1873 and 1874 cost only about $300 a mile. Now the fact is, the law fixes that contract with the roads and makes it the duty of the Postmaster-General to follow up the law, and the compensation of the roads is governed entirely by the amount of weight of mail matter carried. And the cost is fixed thereby; and the revenue of the Government derived from this amount of mail matter carried is in exact ratio to the amount carried. Hence it is a question if the Government pays only a fair compensation for the matter carried on a railroad when it pays $300, whether when it pays $1,000 it does not also get value for that when the wants of the people have demanded the increased tonnage of mails carried and it has become the duty of the Government to supply those wants.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not have risen at this time had it not been for the attack made on the Post-Office Department by the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Georgia. They tried to draw a comparison between the administration of the Navy Department and the Post-Office Department to the disadvantage of the Post-Office Department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know what knowledge these gentlemen possess that the rest of us do not have, and I do not know myself of a single deficiency created by the Post-Office Department that was in the discretion of the Post-Office Department itself. My friend from Tennessee undertakes to say that the Postmaster-General in accommodating the great northern belt of our country with fast mails violated the spirit of the law.

Well, now, gentlemen may differ with my friend from Tennessee as to the spirit of the law. There is one thing that is true, and which the gentleman must confess, and that is, that the Post-Office Department is giving to the people of the country faster time and prompter delivery of mail matter than it has ever done before. I challenge my friend from Georgia to name a single item in this appropriation where there is a deficiency that lies at the discretion of the Post-Office Department. The only deficiencies are those growing out of the execution of the law itself.

I am not surprised at the course taken by my friends. I have been a prophet and a very true one.

I have pointed out this deficiency from year to year, and yet my friends will not learn anything. As my friend from Indiana says, it is simply a question of arithmetic. If my friend from Georgia had been in a northern school and had learned to read, write, and cipher, he would have made a better bill than this.

No man that takes up this question can fail to see that it will take $9,000,000 to execute the law for the year ending June 30, 1880.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am sorry that I was not raised in a northern school. The gentleman from Ohio was, and has unfortunately not learned to cipher at all. But he has asked me to show a single item in this deficiency which did not necessarily result from the law. If he will turn to the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General he will find a deficiency of $44,000 for the pay of railroads.

Mr. FOSTER. That was the law.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to point out to him that Congress appropriated a given sum of money. They declared that there should be no expenditure beyond the amount appropriated. There was an ample sum to put service on every railroad that there was in the country. The deficiency grew out of the fact that he made a decided increase in the postal-car service, which the law did not compel him to do. That $44,000 to pay for railroads is for increase of the postal-car service. During that year 3 per cent. of the whole cost of the railroad postal system of this country was put in postal cars, and this deficiency was in 1871.

I give the gentleman that item, and he may work upon that, and afterward I will give him another one.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not agree with him about the law.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then he had better go to school again.

The question was taken on Mr. BAKER'S amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 89, noes 85.

Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. ATKINS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. BAKER of Indiana were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 76.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I shall call for a yea-and-nay vote in the House upon that amendment.

The Clerk read the next clause of the bill, as follows:

For transportation by steamboat routes, $750,000.

Mr. CHALMERS. I move to amend that clause by striking out, in lines 63 and 64, the words "seven hundred and fifty" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "nine hundred."

I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that upon an examination of the question I find this is the exact amount asked for in the estimates of the Department; but, sir, my object in offering the amendment is not so much to comply with the estimates as to do justice to this service. Upon an examination of the appropriations made in 1860 it appears that at that time we had but 15,000 miles of steamboat route in the United States, and at that time the appropriation made for this service was over $1,000,000. Now we have 18,000 miles of steamboat mail-routes, and the appropriation as asked for by the Department is only $900,000. And yet this estimate has been cut down by the Committee on Appropriations to $750,000; and we who live upon the banks of navigable rivers are to be deprived of the mail facilities extended to the more fortunate inhabitants on railroads.

Now, I do not think the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations have any desire to curtail the facilities of the people who live upon the banks of rivers. Their desire should be and doubtless is to extend the mail facilities to every portion of our country equally, and I am informed that they supposed that the increased railroad service compensated for the decrease of the river service, but a further examination of that question will, I think, satisfy my friends that they are wrong. They ought not to take away from us who live upon the banks of rivers and who are entirely dependent upon steamboats for our mails the facilities that we previously enjoyed, simply because some places on the river can be reached by railroads. The length of the steamboat lines is now far greater than in 1860. The weight of the mails may not be so great, but still the people who are cut off from railroad facilities, and who look alone for their mail supplies by river, are to-day scattered over more territory than they were in 1860, and it is the object of the Post-Office Department to extend facilities to the remotest portions of the country. For this reason I think the demand from the Department is not unreasonable, and should be granted. Just after the war we had mails but once a week on the Mississippi River. Last year we were promised mails semi-weekly, but in fact were served only semi-occasionally. We are entitled to the same service that is given to railroad communities, and I therefore ask an increase of appropriation sufficient to give it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word, not merely in regard to this clause, but in regard to all similar clauses in this bill. I need not say to the gentlemen who have charge of the bill that they will always find me assisting them, but there are things which as an economist and a member of Congress I feel bound to refer to. Among other things I am bound to rejoice in certain classes of increase of appropriation; I mean those wherever the growth of this country develops such a growth in some of the departments of the country as to require an enlarged appropriation to meet it. In such cases I rejoice in an increase of appropriation as a sign of prosperity, as a sign of the enlargement of the interests and the greatness of this country.

In all the branches of the service, I know of no place where we have as good a right to be glad of an increase of appropriations as in the Post-Office Department, so long as it is done with due economy in the methods by which it is accomplished. When the Postmaster-General tells me that the increase of real mail service in this country is very great, so great that he needs more money to carry it on than was appropriated last year for the purpose, I hold it as a sign of the prosperity of our people in all that is worthy in their business, in their intelligence, and in their communications with each other. When the Postmaster-General tells us that the railway service needs a larger appropriation than the committee have put in this bill, I think we ought to give it. When he tells us that the steamboat service needs a larger appropriation in order to meet the growing demands of the country, I think we ought to give it.

I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [MR. CHALMERS,] and with great pleasure. While I say this, I agree with the Committee on Appropriations that all possible economical arrangements should be made to get the service done as cheaply and as honestly as possible. But when the law has fixed the method of compensation, when the law determines the rate per mile for steamboat service, or railroad service, or star service, or what not, I do not see how, without courting a deficiency, without creating a deficiency, we can deliberately cut it down very far below the estimate of the Department. Perhaps we ought to some, but I think not as much as the committee have done in this case.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman says that the rate of compensation for steamboat service is fixed by law at so much per mile.

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, I referred more particularly to the star service.

Mr. BLOUNT. The distinguished gentleman who has just taken his seat speaks one way and his record is another. In the last appropriation bills prepared under his direction there was a decrease in the steamboat service. In the bill making appropriations for 1875 the decrease was 2.94 per cent.; in 1876 the decrease was 5.14 per cent. I take it that when the gentleman had this subject immediately before him and was considering it deliberately, he rather preferred his own judgment to that of the Postmaster-General more than he seems to do when his mind is directed to other matters.

My friend from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] institutes a comparison between the steamboat service before the war and the steamboat service subsequent to the war, both as to the miles of service and the pay per mile. I wish I had time to take up the reports and show how from various points on the Mississippi River, from Saint Paul, Minnesota, to New Orleans, from Alton, Illinois, to New Orleans, from Memphis to New Orleans, the great through mails of the country are now being carried by railroad instead of by steamboat. I would like it if gentlemen could take time to examine the reports of the Postmaster-General from year to year and see how he has anticipated the incoming railway service and taken off the mails from the steamboats, and then they will be able to apprehend to the fullest extent the great revolution that has occurred in the carrying of the mails in that section of the country. They would then understand that to institute a comparison between that time and now would be almost as just as to institute a comparison between the present time and a time before the beginning of railroad service at all.

Let us come down to a later period in the steamboat service. If gentlemen will examine pages 232 and 233 of the report of the Postmaster-General, they will find that the committee have recommended in this bill a higher sum for the steamboat service than has been appropriated at any time since the year 1871. I trust, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole will not seek to reinstate the old steamboat service on the Mississippi River, on the idea that it is needed.

The report of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Browne, who has charge of this department of the service, shows the improvements, the reductions in expenditures, and all the reasons for the steamboat service. He tells you that this long line from way up in Minnesota has been abandoned. The conclusion of the matter is that the steamboat service on the Mississippi River, so far as carrying the mails is concerned, has been cut down until it amounts now to nothing else but supplying the local mails along the river, and even that the Postmaster-General declares can be better supplied from the railroad lines.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I very heartily concur in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.] While it is true that the section of the country which I in part represent is not directly interested in this line of the service, I am not one of those bound by the interest of the various portions of the country by geographical considerations or by difference of locality.

I invite the attention of this committee to one single consideration which, in my judgment, ought to be decisive in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi. I hold in my hand a letter from the Post-Office Department dated January 13, 1879, addressed to my distinguished colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] in which a statement is made in reference to the expenses of the steamboat mail service of the country on the 1st day of October, 1878, that ought to satisfy every man, whether he is liberal in his views or whether he is parsimonious in his views, that the sum of $750,000 is inadequate for the steamboat service.

The Second Assistant Postmaster-General says in that letter:

I have the honor to inform you that the cost of the service—

That is, the steamboat service—on the 1st of October, 1878, was at the rate of $756,771 per annum—

Being at the rate of nearly $7,000 a year more last October for actual service than is proposed to be allowed for the service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880. This bill not only fails to provide for any increase in the mail facilities by steamboats during the next eighteen months, but it actually makes a reduction to the extent of $7,000 in the service as it was in operation on the 1st of October last.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you apply the rule, the propriety of which as demonstrated by the Department must be obvious to every man who will reflect upon it, that the increasing population and business of the country require an increase of from 6 to 8 per cent. in the mail facilities with each successive year, you will see at once that the amount named in the amendment of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi is none too large. I trust that amendment may be agreed to. It is an amendment in the right direction.

Mr. BLOUNT. As I see the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] now before me, I take pleasure in furnishing him another instance of the violation of the law by the Postmaster-General in the matter of deficiencies, where there was no law requiring an increase of the service beyond the amount appropriated. When the post-office appropriation bill was up last year this House was informed that the cost of the steamboat service at that time was $717,619.24, and that the cost under the new letting for steamboat service would be $684,803.24. The gentleman from Indiana has stated to the House, not the cost of the steamboat service at the end of the fiscal year, but what it was in October after the Postmaster-General had been notified that but $700,000 could be expended for that purpose. I cannot see how we are to secure any responsibility in this Department unless we hold it down to the requirements of the law. There is no provision requiring the Department to pay any given sum for steamboat service; it may put it on or take it off according to the means at its disposal. It has no right to make contracts for steamboat service which will bind this House in excess of the appropriation made for such service.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CHALMERS, it was agreed to, there being—ayes 97, noes 71.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will not take time by insisting upon a vote by tellers, but I give notice that in the House I shall ask a vote by yeas and nays on this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation by postal cars, $1,250,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend by adding after the clause just read the following:

Provided, That at no time during the year shall there be supplied such an amount of postal-car service as at that rate per annum will exceed the amount herein appropriated.

I had proposed to explain this amendment briefly, but unless there is objection to it I will not take time in discussing it.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes 34, noes 61.

Mr. BLOUNT. I shall ask a vote in the House on this amendment. I move further to amend by inserting the following:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General may use such portion of the postal-car service appropriation as may be spared from it to supply any deficiency that may arise from insufficient appropriations in the item for railway transportation.

Several MEMBERS. No objection; all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I offer also the following amendment, rearranging some parts of the bill:

Transpose lines 65 and 66, as amended, to be first paragraph under "Second Assistant Postmaster-General;" lines 53 to 62 inclusive, to follow as second paragraph; lines 63 and 64 as third; and lines 50 to 52, as fourth paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADDELL. I move to amend by adding after the clause now pending the following:

Provided, That hereafter in making his estimates for railway mail service the Postmaster-General shall separate the estimate for the postal-car service from the general estimates; and in case any increase or diminution of service by postal cars shall be made by him the reasons therefor shall be given in his annual report next succeeding such increase or diminution.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to amend by inserting after the amendment last adopted the following:

And the proviso to the act entitled "An act to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879," approved December 21, 1878, shall be amended and re-enacted, as follows:

Provided, That no increase in the postal-car service beyond what has existed at some time during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1878, and ending June 30, 1879, shall be made during said fiscal year.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. TUCKER. I hope there will be a vote on this amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I must reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be reserved.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BLOUNT that the committee rise, there were—ayes 115, noes 71.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, and others called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FOSTER and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 90.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6143) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CONSTRUCTION OF RAILWAYS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution of inquiry:

The Clerk read as follows.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to communicate to this House as early as practicable what information he may have as to the authority, if any, by which the Southern Pacific Railroad Company are locating and constructing their road over the land of the United States in the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. FORT. I do not object if that resolution of inquiry is for reference to a committee.

The SPEAKER. It is for asking for information from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FORT. It asks the Secretary of the Interior for a legal opinion.

Mr. STEELE. It is merely for information.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. STEELE. I do not object to its reference.

Objection was withdrawn; and the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

ARMSTEAD BLACKWELL.

Mr. EDEN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to introduce, and have referred the bills which I send up to the Clerk's desk. I do so on behalf of Mr. BLACKBURN, who is absent on committee service.

There was no objection.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6244) making an appropriation to pay the claim of Armstead Blackwell against the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GREEN CLAY SMITH.

Mr. EDEN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6245) providing for the relief of Green Clay Smith, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6246) to amend section 2305 of the Revised Statutes, which allowed services in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to be deducted from the time to perfect title in homesteads; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PAGE moved the House adjourn, but subsequently withdrew the motion.

HENRY C. DE AHNA.

On motion of Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1592) for the relief of Henry C. De Ahna, late collector of customs at Sitka, Alaska, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

UNITED STATES COURTS OF COLORADO.

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado, with amendments of the House, was taken from the Speaker's table, the amendments of the House insisted on, and the conference asked by the Senate agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. STENGER, Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado and Mr. CONGER.

INTERNATIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 226) in relation to the international industrial exposition held at Paris in 1878.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to Congress as soon as practicable a detailed statement of all expenditures which may have been incurred under joint resolution of Congress approved December 15, 1877, making appropriations for the international industrial exposition held at Paris in 1878.

Mr. BANKS. That should be directed to the President, not to the Secretary of State.

Mr. DURHAM. Permit me to say to my friend the resolution is drawn according to the law.

Mr. BANKS. I do not object, but it should go to the President.

Mr. DURHAM. The law requires the Secretary of State to make the statement to Congress, and consequently I have made the resolution conform to the law.

Mr. BANKS. The act should not have been drawn in that way.

Mr. DURHAM. I assure the gentleman it is so. I would have directed the inquiry to the President but for that fact.

Mr. BANKS. I waive my objection.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

That the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the working and investigate the present system and method of constructing public buildings throughout the United States with a view of ascertaining the existence of any abuses or irregularities which may be connected with the same and also of reporting to Congress by bill or otherwise such legislation in respect thereto as may be best calculated to promote efficiency and economy in this branch of the public service; and for this purpose said committee is hereby empowered to send for persons and papers, and to report the result of their investigation at any time.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

Mr. CONGER. Of course if the resolution comes in it is subject to the question of consideration being raised against any report coming from that committee.

Mr. EDEN. Will this resolution give the committee the right to report anything it may choose? In other words, will it give the committee the right to report propositions for the erection of new buildings?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not at all, and that is not the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. EDEN. If it would bear that construction, I certainly must object to it.

Mr. ALDRICH. It has no purpose, but is merely a resolution of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the resolution will be considered as adopted.

Mr. CONGER. Of course, subject to the question of consideration being raised at the time the report is made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois had better withdraw the resolution and modify it as requested by gentlemen.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will withdraw the resolution and modify it as suggested.

OLD POST-OFFICE PROPERTY, NEW YORK.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform the House of Representatives what use is now made by Government of the old post-office property in the city of New York. If rented, to whom and for what term of years and the amount of yearly rental, with a full statement of taxes and all other charges against such rental.

Mr. MULLER. I object.

KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. WIGGINTON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 5295, a bill (H. R. No. 6247) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation in the State of Oregon; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

WINGATE K. WACHTEL AND OTHERS.

Mr. REA, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6248) for the relief of Wingate K. Wachtel, Thomas M. Pitman, David W. Terhune, Valentine Graff, Coleman S. Carter, and Sanford Stoner; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CO-OPERATIVE COMMERCIAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. LINDSEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6249) to incorporate the Co-operative Commercial Association and Manufacturing Exchange (of the Workingmen) of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT IN IDAHO.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Public Lands, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 1135) to create an additional land office in the Territory of Idaho.

The bill was read. It creates in the Territory of Idaho a new land office to be called Oneida land district, the office of which shall be located at Oxford, in Oneida County.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF CHEYENNE INDIANS, ETC.

Mr. SCALES. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into all the circumstances which led to the removal of the Cheyenne Indians, their recent escape from Fort Robinson, and their subsequent slaughter by the United States forces who were charged with their custody; and that said committee report its findings to this body.

Mr. McCOOK. I object.

MISSISSIPPI LEVEE BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that a session was assigned by the House for this evening, commencing at half past seven o'clock, for the consideration of the questions involved in the bill known as the Mississippi levee bill. There are papers here that relate to the subject, which the Chair thinks ought to be printed prior to the consideration of that bill, and in this opinion he has the concurrence of the gentlemen who have the bill in charge. They ask, therefore, that this evening's session be vacated and that they may have the evening of this day week with like rights for the consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WILHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That the representative of Jacob Senseney have permission to withdraw the papers in the case from the files of the Senate.

ADMISSION TO CORRIDOR AND MARBLE ROOM.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move to take up the resolution I offered yesterday relating to admission to the corridor and the Marble Room.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the order of "concurrent and other resolutions," the Senator from Vermont asks the Senate to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday. Is there objection?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That during the remainder of the present session of the Senate no person not entitled to the privileges of the floor shall be admitted to the corridor in rear of the Senate Chamber, or to the Marble Room.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the resolution will not be adopted. The people of this country have a right to be admitted to the corridors of the Capitol. I do not see any special necessity for the resolution. I hope the word of any Senator is sufficient to resist the importunities of lobbyists or anybody else who may come here. I have no disposition to seek to exclude the people from the Capitol of the country, provided they do not incommode Senators in their Chamber. There is no necessity, in my judgment, for the passage of any such resolution, and I hope it will not be passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think there is necessity for the passage of the resolution, for the health and comfort and convenience of Senators, in the first place. This Chamber is one which does not open to the open air anywhere. The rear corridor and the Marble Room were intended to be a part of the Senate Chamber, and are so by the standing rules, with the modification that has been made by an order providing that Senators may introduce persons there, as they cannot bring them on the floor.

When we come to the press of business, with the Senate filled up to the full number of all the States, and occupied as it is, the benefit of having the rear corridor and the Marble Room for the consultation of Senators, for their comfort and relief, when they want to get a moment's air, without disturbing anybody, is of great account, in my belief: and there is plenty of room in the Capitol for visitors.

Mr. BLAINE. There is a fine reception room for them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a fine, large reception room, and there are fine, large corridors all around the Senate Chamber, where citizens of the United States can be just as comfortable as they can be there; and there is plenty of room in the galleries where they can see what is going on.

The remark of the Senator from Delaware would apply to this Chamber as much as to the Marble Room, and therefore we ought to have the whole floor open to any Senator to introduce anybody into the Chamber, or provide that anybody well behaved may come in; that every citizen has an equal right here, and every gentleman in the galleries who hears me now has the same right that any other citizen has to come into this Chamber, and so the interests of public business would be disregarded.

But what we are obliged to attend to makes it practically inconvenient for that to be done. We can make no distinction except the very narrow one of the official relations with persons who come here officially to see us upon business, like the Secretaries, and judges, and so on. If we take another step forward we must take it in favor of everybody, in favor of equal rights; and yet every one knows that is an impossible thing. It is just so in respect of the Marble Room, which was intended for the convenience of Senators, where they could consult and breathe, and do all other things necessary for health and the transaction of business without disturbing the business that is going on here; and now at the end of the session when everything is pressing, in my belief, is the time for it.

Mr. WITHERS. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to the fact that, as I understand the resolution, it is rather too broad in its expression, and if adopted would exclude Senators from the privilege of taking into the Marble Room for conference such persons as they might desire to confer with, inasmuch as it restricts admission to the rear corridor to the rule of special admission to the floor of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. WITHERS. It seems to me the resolution ought to be amended in that particular.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is the very form of resolution that has been adopted toward the end of nearly every session, when we were pressed and crowded, and it has been found to work entirely satisfactorily. The theory upon which people get in there now is that Senators bring them in. The Senator who brings somebody in cannot wait to see that he goes out again; everybody who comes in stays; and therefore there is a jam. It has been found by actual experience hitherto that an order in this very form, putting the rear corridor and Marble Room upon the same footing as this floor exactly, has been a great advantage to Senators.

Mr. WITHERS. I move to amend the resolution by adding the words "except at the request of a Senator."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest to my friend from Virginia simply to say "when accompanied by a Senator," so that the privilege would only be extended to a visitor while a Senator was there in conversation with him.

Mr. WITHERS. I accept the modification suggested by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ANTHONY. That would admit strangers upon the floor if accompanied by a Senator.

Mr. HILL. The exception applies to the Marble Room?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, I cannot agree with the view of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the resolution be reported at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as proposed to be amended will be reported.

The Secrefary read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of the present session of the Senate no person not entitled to the privileges of the floor shall be admitted to the corridor in the rear of the Senate Chamber or to the Marble Room, except when accompanied by a Senator.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was wrong. The Senator from Virginia is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 32, noes 18.

Mr. BLAINE. How does the resolution now stand, as amended?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was read.

Mr. BLAINE. That leaves the rule practically just about where it is to-day.

Mr. WITHERS. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAINE. The rule is that to-day, unless you intend that each Senator shall stand guard over his visitor and see that he is put out just as soon as he is through talking with him. If the amendment just adopted means anything it means just that, that as soon as you are through with your visitor you must say to him, "Now seat! Leave!"

Mr DAVIS, of West Virginia. There are other persons I suppose charged with that duty. The resolution now reads that the privilege is only to be extended to a visitor when accompanied by a Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. And when the Senator is through, the Capitol police I suppose must come in and seize the visitor, whether a lady or gentleman, by the collar and put him out.

Mr. WITHERS. As I understand the Senator he says that the adoption of my amendment practically leaves the rule as it is now. Therefore that can be done under the rule now.

Mr. BLAINE. I say that would be the close construction. The idea now is that no person comes there except for an interview with a Senator. If that be allowed to go on as it is now, I am not more incommoded than Senators in general; but the way the resolution now stands, that is the construction of it. I do not want any friend of mine, lady or gentleman, to have it understood to be a warning that he or she must leave as soon as I do.

Mr. WITHERS. If I understand the Senator, he says the passage of the resolution as amended will leave the rule exactly as it is now. Therefore, I do not see that he is at all subjected to a different rule by its non-passage.

Mr. BLAINE. I think there was a great deal of ground for the Senator from Vermont in offering the resolution; not as a permanent rule, but there will be a very crowded condition of things from this day forward to the end of the session. It is a very short session, and there will be a great deal of business; and I think it is not the slightest indignity to the friend of any Senator to simply say that for the remainder of the session the rear corridor and the Marble Room are reserved for Senators. If you make no exception you leave them free to Senators. If you make this exception it is invidious, and it will be very inconvenient also. I hope the resolution as amended will not be adopted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the resolution both as offered originally and as amended will be voted down. There can be no practical good resulting from it. There are times when gentlemen come here from various parts of the country to look at the Capitol of their country. They like to look upon their representatives here in the Senate. Frequently the galleries of the Senate are so crowded that they cannot possibly get into them. Such was the case in the month of December when the Senator from Maine made his great speech. Many of his constituents and countrymen were anxious to listen to his eloquent voice, and yet if they had been excluded from the rear corridor they would have been excluded entirely from hearing his eloquence on that occasion. I am anxious to let everybody see the Senate and to let everybody look upon the beauty displayed in this Chamber whenever any one desires to do so.

The amendment which has been added would subject us to great inconvenience. Here comes a gentleman from the State of Delaware. He desires to see the Marble Room or the President's Room. As the resolution now stands, he would be excluded. He sends for me to come and accompany him through these halls; he cannot go without me, so that the amendment really subjects every member of this body to a greater inconvenience than he would be subjected to without it. I am opposed to the whole thing. This is a democratic government, and I belong to the democratic party, and the democrats of this country should look upon our doings and criticise them as they very frequently deserve to be. It is a restraint upon our action here.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Delaware if he thinks the crowd in the lobby will be a democratic crowd?

Mr. WITHERS. I will say that every argument advanced by the Senator from Delaware applies with equal force to admission upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it exactly.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope that an exception may be made for all democrats from Delaware who are visiting the Marble Room for the first time. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, but I think the suggestions made by the Senator from Maine are sensible and correct. If it is in order, therefore, having voted for that amendment, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, with a view to adopting the original resolution without amendment. I think it is right to pass the resolution as offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] that the vote be reconsidered by which the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 29, noes 25.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is, will the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS?]

Mr. WITHERS. I wish simply to state that if the amendment is rejected, although I believe we suffer from the evil indicated by the Senator from Vermont, I shall feel constrained myself to vote against the resolution, because I want to reserve the privilege to myself, if opportunity or necessity requires, to introduce a friend into the corridor or the Marble Room for consultation, or any other purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest to my friend from Virginia that if he will try the experiment of this order, as I propose it, for a few days, and he should become dissatisfied with its practical working, anybody can move to discharge it; but I think he will find that the balance of convenience to his constituents and to himself and to the public business will be largely in favor of the proposition. This order can be discharged any day, if it is found really to work inconvenience to Senators.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state before the vote is taken another point, which it seems to me ought to have some bearing in the decision of this question. Those of us who sit on this side of the Chamber have very few places in the Capitol to which we can invite friends for a brief conference. We do not have control of all the committee-rooms; they are controlled by our friends on the opposite side of the Chamber. Only one or two committee-rooms are under the control of the democratic members, and it is a very great convenience to us to have the Marble Room and the rear corridor for the purposes of conference with our constituents, without being subjected to the inconvenience of meeting them in places open to the public generally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to be excused if I say one word upon that topic There is one very fine committee-room of which as chairman I have the ostensible charge, but ever since I have been chairman of it, (and it was so before, I am sure,) every member of that committee, no matter what his politics were, has a key, and is at perfect liberty—which he exercises at all times, just as much as the chairman does—to take his friends there for consultation or any other purpose.

A committee-room belongs to every member of the committee, and every member of the committee that I am speaking of understands that perfectly well.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to add to what the Senator from Vermont has said that there is another committee-room, very eligible, very accessible, to which every member of that committee has access at all times. He may take his friends there, as I take mine; and I have never known any other rule to obtain in this body in relation to any committee.

Mr. WITHERS. Such is not the practice, I know, at least. I do not mean to be understood as saying that democratic members are excluded from the committee-rooms, but I say that the democratic members as a general rule do not feel at liberty to introduce their friends into committee-rooms from the fact that it is known they are controlled by the chairmen of the committees.

Mr. BLAINE. I think my friend from Virginia will hardly apply that to a committee on which he and I have the pleasure to sit together. I am sure the Appropriation Committee room is as open, (and I say that in the absence of the chairman,) and every democratic member of that committee must feel quite as much at liberty and quite as much at home in it with his friends as the republican members of the committee.

Mr. WITHERS. That is not meeting the point at all. I do not assert that every democratic member of a committee has not the right to enter his committee-room, but I say the practical operation of the system is that they feel a delicacy in doing so; that is all.

Mr. BLAINE. We have tried to make them feel altogether at home because we want a little of the same courtesy next year ourselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAXEY. In regard to the point made by the Senator from Virginia, that the democrats have no control over the committee-rooms, I would say that that is a mere question of time, which will very soon settle itself. The Senator from Delaware says that he is a democrat; that this is a democratic Government, and therefore he insists that persons should be permitted to go into the rear corridor and into the Marble Room. I think I am about as good a democrat as anybody, and I am in favor of a democratic form of government; and it is because I am in favor of it that I favor the resolution of the Senator from Vermont. The States have sent us here to do the work of the people of this country, the work of forty-five million people, and the States have a right to demand that no few persons hanging around the corridors of the Capitol and in the Marble Room shall interfere with the business of the States. The very same argument which would admit them there would admit them into the Senate Chamber, and thus the business of the States would be so interrupted and clogged that it would be impossible for us deliberately to do that business which we are sent here to perform. It is within the knowledge of every Senator on this floor that it is almost impossible to hear a single speech, however interesting that speech may be, without having a dozen or more cards sent in during the progress of the debate, and being called out.

In regard to the argument in support of the position taken by the Senator from Delaware that persons were excluded from hearing the speech of the Senator from Maine not long since, I should like to know who could have heard that speech from the Marble Room? If a man being in the Marble Room could have heard a word that the Senator from Maine said, he has better ears than most men in this country.

The point which was made by the Senator from Vermont is conclusive. The Government has provided magnificent galleries, which, so far as their capacity will go, every citizen has a right to enter and hear the proceedings, while this Chamber and the rear corridor and the Marble Room were reserved because the demands of public business required that there should be some place where the representatives of the States could act deliberately without the business of the country being clogged or interfered with, or without being subjected to constant interruption pending a measure upon which they had to deliberate as representatives of the States. The resolution in my judgment is eminently proper and correct, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that the point made by the Senator from Virginia is not met by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Maine. Senators need a very much better place, to which they can invite persons who come to see them on business during the session of the Senate for brief consultation, than the corridors outside of the entrance doors or than the reception room in the rear. The modification of the resolution permits that exact thing. A person comes to see a member of the Senate; he wishes to have a minute's interview, and he ought to be at liberty to take him into the Marble Room for that brief consultation, in his presence, and while he is there, and that is all the amendment contemplates, as I understand it. The committee-rooms are not conveniently situated for such a purpose. Who wants to go up stairs to the room of the Committee on Claims, or down stairs to the room of the Committee on the Judiciary for an interview of that kind? It seems to me that the amendment places the proposed rule in the most convenient possible shape. It excludes everybody from the rear corridor and the Marble Room, but permits Senators, during the continuance of personal interviews with persons with whom they have business, to take them there. Of course that would involve the briefest possible intrusion of strangers into those places, because it is only during the existence of an interview which takes the Senator himself from his seat that this privilege will be accorded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the substance of the rule now.

Mr. WITHERS. If that conclusion were clearly deducible from the language of the resolution, I should not have a word to say; but I contend that the resolution as it stands denies a Senator that privilege.

Mr. MERRIMON. It seems to me that the point made by the Senator from Virginia is not met. Many times during the day Senators are called upon by persons who desire to consult them upon business that requires but a few minutes, and time would not allow the Senator to retire and go to a committee-room. When he is allowed to see the person wishing to see him in the Marble Room very briefly, it adds greatly to his comfort and convenience to do so. He does not want to go out into the corridors around the Senate Chamber or into the public reception-room, or elsewhere. Besides, the rule proposed by the Senator from Vermont overrides a standing order of the Senate, in these words:

Resolved, That the ante-room, known as the Marble Room, being designed as a retiring-room for Senators and such persons as they may think proper to invite into the same, the officers of the Senate be directed not to interfere with such use of said room during the open sessions of the Senate.

That contemplates the very thing that the amendment of the Senator from Virginia provides for. It would cut every one of the Senators off from a very great comfort and convenience in seeing persons who ought to see them during the sessions of the Senate if the resolution passes as originally proposed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In view of the rule just read by the Senator from North Carolina, I ask whether or not the resolution of the Senator from Vermont is in order. It overrides a standing rule of the Senate, as I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that it is in order, no objection having been made and the discussion having proceeded for half an hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I simply ask for information of the Chair whether or not a standing rule can be interfered with, though the resolution itself may have been discussed for a considerable time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me, if this were a standing rule instead of an order of the Senate, I take it we could change it by a resolution on a day's notice, previously introduced, as this was.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The rule provides for that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But the Senator did not give notice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I introduced the resolution yesterday.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I beg pardon; the Senator gave notice of a resolution, but not that he would move to have a standing rule of the Senate changed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This very resolution was introduced here yesterday.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But, as I understand it, the Senator said nothing about changing the standing rules when he gave notice of the resolution which he has this morning called up. However, it is not a point that I insist upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.]

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 28 noes 17.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As thus amended, will the Senate agree to the resolution of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. PATTERSON. Let the resolution be read as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of the present session of the Senate no person not entitled to the privileges of the floor shall be admitted to the corridor in the rear of the Senate Chamber or to the Marble Room, except when accompanied by a Senator.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 36, noes 12.

JOHN C. BIRDSELL.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. No. 501) for the relief of John C. Birdsell, which was passed over the other day under an objection.

Mr. WITHERS. I hope the Senate will not take up that bill. It will operate as an effectual estoppel to the consideration of the bills on the Calendar. It will certainly lead to very protracted discussion, and one that will extend far beyond the morning hour.

Mr. WHYTE. Objection being made, I move to postpone the present order of business, and, that being carried, I shall then move to take up this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to make an inquiry while the Clerk is hunting for the bill, whether that will have the effect to displace the unfinished business when it is reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that it would not, this being within the morning hour.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to say from what I know of the views of Senators that in my judgment this is not a bill which can be acted on without a good deal of discussion. There ought to be a good deal of examination into it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside, and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which has been reported.

A division was called for.

Mr. DAWES. May we have the bill read before we vote on the question of taking it up?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It can be reported if the Senator desires it.

Mr. DAWES. That is the object of my rising.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts desires that the bill be read at length: the Secretary will read the bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside, and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill just read by the Secretary.

Mr. THURMAN. That bill will be debated at very considerable length. It cannot pass between now and one o'clock.

Mr. WHYTE. We have till half past one.

Mr. THURMAN. It cannot be passed between now and two o'clock. I have a great many remonstrances from my State against it that I feel it my duty to present to the Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. I think our friends who object to the consideration of this bill are unnecessarily alarmed. It is the poor little clover-thrasher that has been doing a large amount of beneficial work in the southern country within the last few years, and the people there are very willing to have the patent continued, that they may enjoy the benefit of this machine for a few years longer. There are two or three objectors who think that they have got an invention that rivals it, but it is a delusion and a snare, and, consequently, I should like to have this matter disposed of at once and let them turn their attention to the purchase of this Maryland patent.

Mr. WITHERS. It is not a Maryland patent.

Mr. WHYTE. It is a patent which to-day employs from one hundred and fifty to two hundred men in Maryland making this machine alone. The patent was obtained just before the war. The war closed out the whole southern market. Those fertile fields were closed to these Maryland people, and the consequence is that they have only been able in the last few years to get this thrashing-machine into use in the southern country. The committee have reported favorably. They have shown that it is a machine of great utility and that the extension of the patent will not be any serious tax upon the community at all.

Under the circumstances, Mr. President, I do not believe that any serious argument can be made against it, and therefore I ask that the Senate take it up and allow it to be disposed of. It will not create one-third of the argument that the Warren Mitchell claim did that we disposed of yesterday in a short time. I hope the Senate will agree to take it up and vote it up or vote it down and dispose of the case.

Mr. WITHERS. I can assure the Senator that it will be debated at considerable length, and as he appears peculiarly as the representative of the agricultural interest I tell my friend he has not hay-seed enough in his hair to represent the agriculturists on this floor; on this question he may represent the manufacturers, not the agriculturists. The patent has run twenty-one years; the inventor has made more than a million dollars out of it; it is a tax on the agricultural interest, selling the machine at more than one hundred times its actual cost. This is a tax that the farmers of the country are required to pay; and as a representative of that agricultural interest I desire to be able to procure for them as cheap agricultural implements as it is possible to procure. This patent having already run for twenty-one years I shall oppose any further extension.

Mr. HOAR. As a reason why I think the sense of justice of the Senate will induce it to take up this report, whatever disposition it may finally make of the subject, I may mention that this was one of the first reports made from the Committee on Patents at the last session of the Senate last year and it was thoroughly heard before the Committee on Patents, a report made, and the case reached for decision and taken up in the Senate. Then an opponent of the extension said that he had requested a particular Senator to make known his opposition to the committee and to secure for him a hearing, and that Senator by inadvertence had forgotten to make the communication; and thereupon the friends of the patent, in order that there might be no possible complaint of the forgetfulness of a member of this body, consented to have the case recommitted to the committee and a new and full hearing given.

Now, it seems to me that whatever disposition shall be made of the bill on the merits of the report, the Senate will be willing that the case may be restored to the position in order for a hearing that it had before the recommitment.

Mr. KERNAN. That was done; and it was put on the Calendar as of the time of the original report.

Mr. HOAR. No, that was not done. It was actually reached for hearing when its recommitment took place and the discussion had begun in the Senate.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether there was any evidence before the Committee on Patents showing that this inventor had received any million of dollars for this patent as stated by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HOAR. That matter was very thoroughly examined on the evidence, and the evidence shows very clearly that the Senator from Virginia has been misled in making that statement.

Mr. WITHERS. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from New Hampshire asked me whether there was any evidence before the committee in support of the statement that this patentee had received a million dollars, to which I replied that that matter was thoroughly heard before the committee, and the evidence before the committee showed very clearly that the Senator from Virginia had been misled when he expressed his belief of that fact.

Mr. WITHERS. Possibly evidence may have come into the possession of the Senator from Virginia differing from that which came before the committee, and the Senator from Virginia may prove to be correct.

Mr. HOAR. Undoubtedly. I am merely answering as to the fact of the evidence before the committee.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to state for the information of the Senate that the petition of this gentleman, which was laid before the committee in printed form, shows on page 12 a "statement of receipts from every source on account of the invention." Then there is a statement year by year, and the amount as appears there is $1,081,790. Then there is an estimate below of the present value of certain things, making $1,881,570 under the head of "receipts." Then he gives the expenditures, including divers fires, expenses, and losses, making the expenses somewhat larger—larger by less than $100,000. Any gentleman who takes up the papers with this petition must analyze them and say whether, as the public has paid more than a million of money, the parties can get up a loss because their shops were burned and their lawyers charged high, and so on. I believe the committee heard no evidence beyond the affidavits and papers which were laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of general orders under the special order.

Mr. FERRY. Is not the morning hour until half past one?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] to extend the morning hour, except for the consideration of the Calendar, until half past one.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that the resolution be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution, adopted by the Senate on the 20th instant:

Resolved, That at the conclusion of the morning business each day after this day the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, and continue such consideration until half past one o'clock; and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

Mr. FERRY. I understand this is a case on the Calendar taken up within the time of half past one. Is it the construction that it applies only to those cases where a single objection does not obtain?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This case has been passed over on the Calendar upon objection.

Mr. FERRY. But it is taken from the Calendar; it stands on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It remains on the Calendar in its original position. The resolution calls for the consideration of the Calendar at the point at which it was left off on the last day of the call.

Mr. FERRY. It retook its place I suppose when the consideration was passed before.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It retains its place upon the Calendar unquestionably. It is not now in order without a motion to set aside the pending and prior orders.

Mr. FERRY. That is the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WHYTE. That was the motion I made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. But it was made within the morning hour.

Mr. WHYTE. Then I make the motion now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland now renews his motion that the pending and all prior orders be set aside.

Mr. HAMLIN. I thought the Chair recognized me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot do that in justice to the Senator from Maryland, he having the floor on this question. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 25.

CHAPLAINS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I have asked the indulgence of the Senate on no occasion during this session to consider any bill out of its order. I now ask the body to indulge me by taking up Senate bill No. 1446, being a bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and as I am informed unanimously agreed to by that committee, for promoting the efficiency of the corps of chaplains of the United States Navy. I think it will provoke no debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the Senate will at this time consider the bill (S. No. 1446) for promoting the efficiency of the corps of chaplains of the United States Navy. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be considered before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That section 1396 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to read as follows: "A chaplain in the Navy shall not be less than twenty-five nor more than thirty-five years of age at the time of his appointment. No person shall be appointed as chaplain until he shall furnish proof that he is a regular minister of some religious denomination, in good standing at the time of his appointment, together with a recommendation for such appointment from some authorized ecclesiastical body or from not less than five accredited ministers of said denomination; and further, no person shall be appointed as chaplain unless he has been pastor or assistant pastor of some church for at least one year."

SEC. 2. That section 1479 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to read as follows: "Chaplains in the Navy shall have relative rank as follows: Four the relative rank of captain, eight that of commander, and all others that of lieutenant-commander. No chaplain shall be promoted to the relative rank of captain until he has had six years' sea service as a chaplain. Whenever a vacancy shall occur in the highest grade it shall be filled by promoting from a lower grade the senior chaplain who has the requisite amount of sea service and is otherwise qualified: Provided, That the restriction as to sea service shall not prevent the promotion of the first four chaplains holding the relative rank of commander at the time of the passage of this act."

SEC. 3. That the paragraph of section 1556 of the Revised Statutes which refers to chaplains be repealed; and the paragraph which refers to surgeons, paymasters, and chief engineers be amended so as to read as follows: "Surgeons, paymasters, chief engineers, and chaplains who have the same rank with paymasters during the first five years after date of commission, when at sea, $2,800; on shore duty, $2,400; on leave or waiting orders, $2,000; during the second five years after such date, when at sea, $3,200; on shore duty, $2,800; on leave or waiting orders, $2,400; during the third five years after such date, when at sea, $3,500; on shore duty, $3,200; on leave or waiting orders, $2,600; during the fourth five years after such date, when at sea, $3,700; on shore duty, $3,600; on leave or waiting orders, $2,800; after twenty years from such date, when at sea, $4,200; on shore duty, $4,000; on leave or waiting orders, $3,000

SEC. 4. That section 1395 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to read as follows: "There shall be in the Navy not exceeding twenty chaplains, who shall be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate; and no appointment of a chaplain shall be made until the whole number is reduced within the limit herein specified."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to inform us whether that increases the salaries of these chaplains.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a report accompanying this bill which will perhaps give the fullest information on the whole subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MCPHERSON on the 24th instant:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 146, to promote the efficiency of the corps of chaplains of the United States Navy, after consideration thereof, beg leave to report back the same with a substitute therefor, and recommend the passage of the latter.

SECTION 1.

The first sentence changes the limits of age at the time of appointment. The present limits are twenty-one and thirty-five years. It needs no argument to show that no man is fit for a position of so much responsibility unless he is at least twenty-five years of age. The second sentence provides for reasonable limitations upon the appointment of chaplains. It is an exact rescript of the statute with reference to Army chaplains. As amended it cannot possibly be distorted into excluding any one on account of creed. It simply provides that any man who is appointed to the position must be of good standing and reputation among his own people. The requirement of at least one year's previous experience will commend itself to the judgment of all.

SECTION 2.

The first part of this section introduces no innovation and provides no new rank. It simply corrects an error in the act of March 3, 1871. Previously to that all chaplains entered the service with the relative rank of lieutenant-commander, and, after twelve years of service, were promoted to the relative rank of commander—the highest rank then held in the staff of the Navy. The act of March 3, 1871, provided higher rank for the staff, and, without their solicitation, four chaplains were granted the relative rank of captain. Seven were also ranked as commanders, but the next lower grade was limited to seven, making the total number granted relative rank only eighteen, while the statutes allow twenty-four chaplains. Thus six chaplains were entirely unprovided for, and have for nearly eight years occupied an entirely anomalous position, causing great inconvenience to themselves and great trouble to the Navy Department. The circumstances which make relative rank necessary for the eighteen who have it, make it equally necessary for the six who do not have it. Chaplains have no desire for rank at all, per se, but, in a military organization, the thousand and one questions of precedence can be settled in no other way.

The second part of this section is inserted to insure a just proportion of sea duty to each one. The relative rank of captain carries with it the privilege of continuous shore duty, and no one ought to have that unless he has done his share of disagreeable duty. If any chaplain does not wish to go to sea, let him find a work that suits him better.

SECTION 3.

This section increases the pay of chaplains, placing them on an equality, in this respect, with surgeons or paymasters, and chief engineers. No professional man can be expected to leave civil life and subject himself to long absences from his family unless he has the inducement of such preferment and increased pay as his talents and constantly enlarging experience would give him in civil life. This is recognized in every corps except that of chaplains. All other staff officers, after certain grades, have their pay increased up to fifteen and twenty years of service. Chaplains have now only one increase, at the end of five years, so that a chaplain who has served five years gets as much pay as one who has served forty years. The natural tendency of this is to drive out the men we need to keep, and keep men we could well spare. Such has been the fact, except in the case of a few worthy men who have remained from conscientious principles. Of the twenty-four chaplains now in the service, only two have served sixteen years, and fifteen have not served ten years. This shows a rapidity of change which is not healthy. Other things being equal, the longer a man is in the service the more efficient he can be, especially in dealing religiously with sailors, who form a class so distinctly sui generis. Chaplains simply ask to be put on the same footing with officers whose equals they are expected to be in every respect, and with whom they share equally all expenses, including heavy mess bills and fees for official entertainments, which are provided for in other navies at the national expense. Chaplains have the entire charge of the religious and educational instruction of men and boys, including the hundreds of apprentices under the new system. They have no subordinates or clerks to assist them as other officers have. Abundant testimony can be brought to the fact that no other officer can be so efficient in securing comfort, good order, and good discipline among the men. The question then comes down to this: "How shall we secure an efficient, worthy corps?" Only by making it an object for good men to come in and stay in. If chaplains are to accomplish any good, it must be evident that the power which creates them intends them to be respectable and respected.

SECTION 4.

As an offset to the increased expenditure involved in section 3, this amendment proposes to reduce the number of chaplains to twenty. In the opinion of the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, and of the chaplains themselves, this can be done without impairing the efficiency of the corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HAMLIN. At the suggestion of a friend I move to amend the bill in the fourteenth line of the first section, after the word "church," by inserting "or congregation." It has been suggested to me that in some parts of the country the word "church" would bear a technical construction; that there are many religious societies which have places of worship that are not churches.

Mr. SARGENT. The phrase used in the bill is an exact transcript of the phrase used in the Army, and if it is sufficient in that service it certainly ought to be in this.

I should be in favor of going further and requiring that a person should have graduated at some institution, that he should have a degree of master of arts at least, especially in the case of Navy chaplains, because when they go abroad they are invited to preach before foreign officers and on other occasions, and ought to display to a certain degree the culture of their profession among the American people. I would not like at any rate to reduce the standard any lower.

Mr. HAMLIN. With that explanation by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, not seeking to change the text of the existing law, I withdraw my motion.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OSAGE CEDED LAND SUITS.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2153) providing for the payment of counsel fees in Osage ceded land suits.

Mr. SARGENT. That does not come up on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does not. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the Senate now consider it.

Mr. SARGENT. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2423) to restrict the immigration of Chinese to the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 226) in relation to the expenditures at the industrial exposition in Paris in 1878.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1135) to create an additional land district in the Territory of Idaho.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its amendment to the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM S. STENGER of Pennsylvania, Mr. T. M. PATTERSON of Colorado, and Mr. O. D. CONGER of Michigan, managers at the same on the part of the Senate.

POST-ROUTE BILL—REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That message reminds me of what I had forgotten, and that is to ask that the Chair have authority to appoint the select committee ordered by the Senate the other day in regard to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-routes, &c. I make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the Chair have authority to appoint the select committee to whom the post-route bill was referred? Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. VOORHEES. There are a number of bills on the Calendar granting pensions, to which there will be no objection, and I rise to ask the consent of the Senate to call up the pension cases that are on the Calendar and have them disposed of. There are a great many persons entitled to the relief which these bills give who are in great need of that relief at once. For that purpose, I move that the Senate dispose of that branch of business on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana that the Senate now consider the pension cases on the Calendar?

Mr. CONKLING. Is my friend's request to select the pension cases under the rule?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection, provided the case of William B. Whiting, which has been greatly discussed, is not one.

Mr. WITHERS. I reported that case, and I am willing that it shall not be considered now as it will lead to debate.

Mr. VOORHEES. I want to pass those that are not objected to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana, and the Secretary will report the pension cases on the Calendar in the order in which they occur.

LAURENA C. P. HASKINS.

The bill (S. No. 413) to increase the pension of Laurena C. P. Haskins, which was reported adversely from the Committee on Pensions, was announced to be the first pension bill on the Calendar.

Mr. WITHERS. Let that be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered unless objection be made. It is ordered.

CATHARINE D. HUNT.

The bill (H. R. No. 3376) granting a pension to Catharine D. Hunt, which was reported adversely from the Committee on Pensions, was announced to be the next pension bill on the Calendar.

Mr. WITHERS. Let it be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

ANDREW J. MORRISON.

The bill (H. R. No. 3572) granting a pension to Andrew J. Morrison was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Andrew J. Morrison, at the rate of the pension allowed for the rank of captain of infantry.

Mr. WHYTE. Why do you pass over the bill for Julia Watkins which has passed the House?

Mr. VOORHEES. Because it is reported adversely.

Mr. WHYTE. But I should like to have a vote on it. I believe the Senate will overrule the committee.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let this bill be acted on.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Indiana who has charge of these bills. I observe that this bill places Morrison on the roll, "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws." I should like to inquire whether under that language he will be entitled to the arrears of pension that we provided for the other day?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not think the bill allows that; but that will be a matter of construction at the Pension Office. I think I may say that the Committee on Pensions do not put that construction on it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But it seems to me from the phraseology of the bill that it may bear a construction which will give pension back to the time the disability occurred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not hear the Senator from Indiana when he made his response to the Senator from Delaware as to the effect of this bill under the arrears of pension act as it is called.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will answer as best I can.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was unable to hear the Senator.

Mr. VOORHEES. In all legislation that we have had granting pensions in special cases, we have provided for the name of the applicant being placed on the pension-roll subject to existing laws and regulations. We cannot do anything else now. If we have changed the law by recent legislation and made a different construction necessary, that will be found out hereafter from the bureau, and if it necessitates some changes we shall have to make them; but how to do otherwise than to provide for putting the names of pensioners on the rolls subject to existing laws and the regulations of the office I cannot imagine. This bill follows the course of our previous legislation upon this subject. How far it will be affected by the act on the subject of arrears of pensions, if is not my province to say, because the construction of the Pension Office has not yet been made on that subject. But, as I said to the Senator from Delaware, I think I may say that the sense of the Pension Committee is that in these special cases there will be no arrearages of pension.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was not in favor of the passage of the arrears of pension bill, but it is the law and being the law it must be followed. Now that bill says:

That all pensions which have been granted under the general laws regulating pensions, or may hereafter be granted, in consequence of death, shall date back to the time of discharge or the time of disability, which is a doubtful question on the act as it stands, which will lead to a good deal of mischief and trouble; but if this bill passes (and I do not say it should not because I do not know why this poor fellow should be distinguished from the others who are provided for by this general law,) it is clear to my mind that he will be entitled to draw from the date of his disability or the date of his discharge, as the case may be, which is the other question that I will not go into; and I do not see why he ought not to. If the Pension Office has wrongfully or by mistake or otherwise failed to give this man a pension that he is entitled to, as we decide now that he is entitled to it if we pass this bill, why should he not stand upon as good a footing as those who got their pensions because the Pension Office decided right in the first instance? I do not see any ground of distinction; and therefore this being the law, I do not see any reason to complain of this bill because he may draw arrears. If we pass the bill it must be upon the ground, which the Committee on Pensions have found to be a good one, that he was disabled by military service and through some defect of one sort or another that does not affect the merits of the matter he has been unable to get the Pension Office to allow it. We correct that error. I do not see why he should be made to suffer because we have to correct an error of the Pension Office, or correct a defect of proof, if we find the fact to be so. So it is no objection in my mind to the passage of this particular bill that this gentleman is going to draw $10,000, or whatever it may be, for arrears. He has just as good a right to it, if the committee is right—as I have no doubt it is—that his is a just case, as if he had got the pension through the ordinary operation of the law.

Mr. WITHERS. I merely wish to state that the views of the Pension Committee in reference to that subject, as I understand them, were that the provisions of the arrears of pension bill would apply only to cases where pensions were granted under the provisions of the general laws, and would not apply to cases of pensions granted by special act. They may have erred in their construction, but that was the construction of the committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say that I shall vote against this bill without knowing anything of the merits of it. I voted against the arrears of pension bill, because I thought it improper that such a bill should pass at this time. I cannot vote now to give this gentleman arrears of pension from this time back to the period he was disabled, it may have been in 1862, 1863, or 1864, I cannot tell when; but because it does in my judgment give to him the arrears of pension which I think ought not to have been given to any of these pensioners of the Government, I shall be compelled to vote against the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION BILLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time within which the Calendar of general orders is to be considered under the special order has expired. The Senate proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business, being the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that the morning hour be extended.

Mr. VOORHEES. I beg the Senator from Vermont to allow us half an hour to dispose of this pension calendar. There are a great many cases in want where we have found that the parties are entitled to relief, and we want to give it now. It will take but a short time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, nobody has ever appealed to me in respect of the granting of pensions for actual sufferers, in vain; but the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is fairly entitled to the floor upon his amendment to the resolutions I have offered. If he is willing to have these pension cases go on for half an hour, I have not the slightest objection. I should be glad to have it done.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Vermont is very kind. I am not entitled to the floor except through his courtesy. I made the motion yesterday to adjourn the Senate until to-day. He can have the floor on his resolutions, and is really entitled to it. However, if the Senator is determined that I shall take the floor and puts upon me the question of courtesy whether the pension bills shall go on, I shall yield to them.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Alabama.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the unfinished business of the Senate be postponed for one-half hour without prejudice? To this the Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will report the next pension bill on the Calendar.

LYDIA A. MORRIS.

The bill (H. R. No. 4364) granting a pension to Lydia A. Morris was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Lydia A. Morris, widow of John K. Morris, late private Company A, Fifth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANN M. PAULDING.

The bill (S. No. 1454) granting a pension to Ann M. Paulding, widow of Hiram Paulding, late senior rear-admiral of the United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes from and after the 20th of October, 1878, to place the name of Ann M. Paulding, widow of Hiram Paulding, late the senior rear-admiral of the United States Navy, on the pension-roll, and to pay her from the interest on the naval pension fund at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to add to that:

Provided, The law granting arrears of pension shall not apply to this act.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope that amendment will not be made. I think these bills are placed on the proper ground by the Senator from Vermont, and that it should be no objection to their passage because the parties may derive the same benefit which others do under the bill for arrearages of pension. I do not want to take up the little precious time that has been kindly granted in discussing this proposition, but I hope the Senate will not attach such an amendment to these bills. Let them go to the Pension Bureau; we shall soon have a construction upon them, and if there is any injustice done by that office we can correct it here.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have been informed that at the Pension Bureau some of the estimates are that a very large class of persons who had hitherto not applied for pensions, finding that they will be entitled under the operation of the law granting arrearages of pension to a large sum of money, have now come forward with claims for pensions; and it is to prevent any application of that kind to obtain arrears of pension that I propose to say in these acts granting pensions that the claims of persons coming now by special act to get pensions shall be limited to the laws existing prior to the law granting arrears of pension. I do not know personally anything about what may be the amount taken out of the Treasury by the act we passed granting arrears of pension, but there are various estimates, and some very high, and I understand, as I before remarked, that according to one estimate a large number of persons who had hitherto not applied for pensions, perhaps technically entitled to them, will now come forward because of the vast amount of money which they will get under that act. I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIA WATKINS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I now yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WHYTE. House bill No. 3111 was passed over inadvertently. I ask that it be taken up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that a pension bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. It is a pension bill with an adverse report, and I told the Senator from Maryland he might have it considered.

The bill (H. R. No. 3111) granting a pension to Julia Watkins, widow of Thomas H. Watkins, late captain Company B, Purnell Legion, Maryland, was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which way was the report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The bill is reported adversely.

Mr. WHYTE. There was an adverse report made by the Senate committee, but not in writing. There is a report made by the House committee, and the House passed the bill. I think if the Senator from Vermont will allow that report to be read he will consent to the passage of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but that I should consent anyhow; but I should not want to consent upon having a House report read here to influence the action of the Senate, as a matter of propriety.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator will allow me to read it and adopt it as part of my own remarks. I was only going to put it in that form. I should like to state this case. It will not take three minutes, and it might as well be voted on now as not.

This is a very peculiar case, a case that of all others addresses itself to the Senate as a case in which Congress ought to do something for this poor woman. I know some of the circumstances of this case.

Watkins, as soon as the war broke out, volunteered, in 1861 went into the Federal Army, and discharged his duty with great fidelity as a soldier. He was ordered to arrest a man by the name of Boyle, a confederate. He arrested him and brought him into the camp. Boyle swore that at the first opportunity he could get he would take Watkins's life. Watkins was wounded in the war. He went home, returned to his command, and was I think either discharged or again went home on furlough, I cannot tell which, but I will take it in the worst phase of the case that he was discharged and was not reinlisted. He went home to see his family, and on that visit to his family while he was at home this man went to his house, found him sitting at the side of his wife with his children around him, entered that house, and deliberately shot him while he there sat.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The confederate that he had arrested?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir; who had threatened that on the first opportunity he would kill him, and this was the first opportunity that he had of killing him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have said enough to convince me, if that is your case.

Mr. WHYTE. That is the case and I am familiar with it because it happened close to the seat of government where subsequently I acted as governor and understood the circumstances.

Mr. WITHERS. In the absence of the chairman of the committee I scarcely think it is right for my friend to press this claim, inasmuch as he has reported adversely upon the case, and no written report appearing to be submitted no one except the chairman of the committee can be cognizant of the reasons which prompted him to make the adverse report. I think the Senate, not being in possession of the reasons which influenced him or the committee, should not take action on the case in his absence.

Mr. VOORHEES. Generally I should concur with the Senator from Virginia, and I do not rise to dissent from his view now; but I do rise to assure the Senate that the Senator from Maryland has stated the facts of this case correctly, and I presume the adverse report was made by the chairman of the committee because the man did not technically and literally lose his life in the line of duty in the service; but in point of fact this man lost his life at the hands of the enemies of the Government as much as if he had been slain in battle. There is no question about that.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me, if the Senator from Maryland has stated the case correctly, that this pension ought to be granted. I know of a few exceptional cases of this character, and I want to call the attention of the Senators on the Pension Committee to one other now pending before the committee. That is the case of John S. Corlett, who did not lose his life but who was not mustered into the service and yet lost his leg in the service by reason of the fact that he was actually in the service. It seems to me that the rule adopted by the Senate Committee on Pensions is hardly a just one, that the people who are making application for pensions must have been mustered regularly into the United States service. It seems to me where service was being rendered and in the act of that service loss of a limb or an arm or loss of life occurred the parties are entitled to pensions. Therefore I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I do not like to antagonize the bill, and if my friend from Indiana is clear in his recollection that the facts as stated by the Senator from Maryland were proved before the committee, I will withdraw my objection; but such is not my recollection of the facts of the case. My recollection is—and it is a mere matter of memory—that it was established before the committee that this man was not in the military service at all, that it was after his discharge and after the war was over that this shooting occurred. That is my recollection of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what the Senator from Maryland stated, if I correctly understood him. If I correctly understood him, the case was this: the husband of this poor widow was regularly in the military service of the United States, and in the performance of his duty he arrested this other person, a confederate or whatever they called him, and did his duty in bringing him to headquarters or wherever it was. This person who was arrested was angry about it and threatened at the first opportunity to take the life of the soldier. The soldier either from wounds or from the expiration of his term of service was discharged and went home. Having got home this same man who had made this threat went and murdered him in his own house and on account of that fact. Now I say if there is any case——

Mr. WITHERS. There is exactly the point in the case. There are two points. One is this: if we admit that a man who once served in the Army and was subsequently killed after the conclusion of the war is entitled to a pension, that establishes a law different from the pension law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the point I make at all.

Mr. WITHERS. According to my recollection, the evidence did not substantiate the allegation that it was in consequence of the previous arrest that this outrage was committed. That is the point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see how that was. Both the Senators appear to agree that while this man was in the service he did a particular piece of public duty that he was bound to perform. The man whom he took into custody then and there threatened on that account that he would kill him at the first opportunity. This poor fellow was wounded and discharged and went home, and this man did kill him on the first opportunity. Now I repeat that if there is any case that appeals to the sense of justice and of fair play in the Congress of the United States toward the soldiers in the Union Army, I think his widow is entitled to a pension as clearly as if this man had been shot in battle if he was out of the service, because it was a consequence of his doing his regular duty that he was brutally murdered without having the fair chance that people do in a fair battle. I shall vote for the bill with the greatest satisfaction.

Mr. WHYTE. I want to add to what the Senator from Vermont has said this fact, that he was compelled to leave the Army by reason of wounds received at the time of arresting this very confederate or rebel.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have a good case.

Mr. WITHERS. That which alone impels me to say anything in the matter is the fact that the chairman of the committee who made the report is not here. He is alone cognizant of the facts in the case which prompted him to draw an unfavorable conclusion. His conclusion was sustained by the committee, evidently. Although I do not recollect with sufficient distinctness to state it to the Senate, as definitely proved and established, the impression on my mind is what I have stated. But I want to call the attention of the Senate to the point whether it is proper, in the absence of the chairman of the committee who has examined into the whole case, to act upon it without a full knowledge of the facts.

Mr. VOORHEES. In order to relieve myself from any misconstruction, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that I am not pressing the passage of this bill in the absence of the chairman. I as an act of courtesy, which it afforded me great pleasure to grant the Senator from Maryland, yielded to him to call this case up and submit it to the Senate. It has been done. I think the Senator from Maryland has correctly stated the facts. The bill was reported adversely by the committee as I said, and I have no doubt on the ground that technically this man was not in the service at the time of his death; but the Senate is now in possession of all the facts as fully as it could be if the Senator from Kansas were here, and as the bill is now before the Senate I presume it is as well to vote upon it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Under the circumstances, in the absence of the Senator from Kansas who reported this bill, while it is a very unpleasant thing to do, I feel constrained to object to it.

Mr. WHYTE. An objection will not do. We have agreed to take up all these pension cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The pension bills were taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. WITHERS. Where there was no adverse report.

Mr. WHYTE. There was no limitation about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. We only agreed to act upon unobjected cases on the pension calendar.

Mr. SARGENT. It seems to me there is some haste in passing this bill. The Senator from Kansas will undoubtedly be here in a few days. There is some confusion in reference to the facts of the case. There is a doubtful principle involved, whether, when a person who is out of the service is slain after having left the service, his widow and children are entitled to a pension. That certainly is a doubtful principle. We all understand very clearly that if we make an exception in this case and say that the principle shall be construed in favor of the claimant, we must extend the same relief in many other cases. Now, was this person killed by the confederate whom he arrested for the reason that he had arrested him? I understand the Senator from Virginia to say that as far as he remembers the discussion and evidence before the committee that was not so, but it was for some other cause. He may have been killed by the same person, but killed from a new cause of quarrel; or he may not have been killed by the same person.

Mr. WHYTE. He was killed by the same person. It was a matter of public notoriety in Maryland. Nobody doubted it. He went to the man's house, and shot him in his own house.

Mr. SARGENT. There still may have been another cause of quarrel. It may have arisen out of an entirely different state of circumstances. If it is clearly shown to the Senate that this person was killed by this confederate for the acts the person had done; if that is the fact, I shall be disposed to vote for the bill; but at present doubt is thrown on the facts. I certainly am in doubt, and I presume there are also other Senators in the same position, and it is only fair that the chairman of the committee who has made the adverse report should be heard. It is very well known that his absence is only temporary. It seems to me the haste for pressing this bill is a little extraordinary.

Mr. WHYTE. There is no haste about it.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the floor a moment, if the Senator from Maryland will allow me, because I think the objection made by the Senator from Missouri deserved a treatment which was denied it. The Senate is proceeding under a request made by the Senator from Indiana. I took pains to ask him whether that request was that the pension bills should proceed under the rule, one feature of which is that the Senator from Missouri or any other Senator may object "at any stage," in the language of the rule. The honorable Senator from Indiana said yes, that was his request. I said then I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state, if the Senator from New York will yield, that the present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at that time. If that was the case, certainly the objection made by the Senator from Missouri would be good.

Mr. CONKLING. I rose to make that statement because I know that both the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Maryland—I make no observations upon the bill, because I know nothing about it—would wish to have executed the understanding as it really was.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. WHYTE. I did not so understand it.

Mr. CONKLING. The understanding was with the acting chairman of the committee, who sits here, and who says he did so understand. Certainly I did so understand.

Mr. VOORHEES. When I asked unanimous consent of the Senate to take up pension cases the Senator from New York did ask me whether we were to proceed under the rule; that is, to take up cases that were not objected to, and I agreed to proceed under the rule. That is the fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An objection, then, at any stage would be good. The Senator from Missouri having objected, the bill goes over. The half hour having expired, the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Alabama will yield to me, I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state again for the information of the Senate that personally I do not claim the floor from the Senator from Vermont; but still if he persists in considering the resolutions that he offered in the Senate as in my charge I will yield to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay before the Senate a bill of the House of Representatives for reference.

The bill (H. R. No. 2423) to restrict the immigration of Chinese to the United States was read twice by its title.

Mr. SARGENT. A bill of which that is a copy with one slight variation has been before the Committee on Foreign Relations during this Congress. I desire that this bill shall go to that committee, and wish also to direct their attention to the bill, hoping that we may have a report upon it very soon.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That Mr. CHRISTIANCY be excused from further service as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and that Mr. ALLISON be appointed to fill the vacancy occasioned thereby.

On motion of Mr. CHAFFEE, (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 29, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MORRIS DWIGHT.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to report for consideration at this time, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, a bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Morris Dwight, dependent father of the late Colonel A. W. Dwight, of the One hundred and twenty-second Regiment New York Volunteers.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Is there a report in this case?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. A report upon a similar bill was made during the last Congress.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Let that report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

That the late Colonel A. W. Dwight was killed in the service of his country as a soldier at the battle of Fort Steadman on the 25th day of March, 1865. His father and mother are both living, but for about forty years have lived in a state of separation. The son performed, prior to his death, his filial duty alike to both, but by his will left his estate to his mother, who is amply provided for. At the time the son made his will, his father, Morris Dwight, who is now about eighty years old, was the prospective heir to certain property in Virginia, which would have placed him also out of reach of want, and this consideration prevented the son from making provision for his father by will. The property which the father would have received has been lost without the default of the father, and he is now left in his old age almost penniless. Had the son lived, the father would not thus have been left in want, and as the son's death was for his country, the country should discharge, on account of the services and wounds of his son, this debt.

Your committee would therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 6250) granting a pension to Morris Dwight was received, read three several times, and passed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REORGANIZATION OF MILITIA.

Mr. STONE, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6251) to reorganize and discipline the militia of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COAST SURVEY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of expenditures on account of coast survey for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I ask that that report be laid on the table and printed. The bill to which it was intended to relate was reported to the House yesterday, and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The motion of Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the board of engineers upon the improvement of the low-water navigation of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETER D. RANKE.

Mr. BREWER asked unanimous consent for leave to withdraw the papers relating to the claim of Peter D. Ranke, now before the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. There having been an adverse report in this case, under Rule 164 the request will be referred to the Committtee on Military Affairs.

EDWARD H. LEIB.

Mr. REILLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6252) granting an increase of pension to Edward H. Leib; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the rules be suspended and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. Are we not to have a morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is now in order.

Mr. HOOKER. Is not the regular order the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is in order at any time, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman to make that motion because he knows it is in reference to an appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. If that motion is voted down will the morning hour follow?

The SPEAKER. It will, unless interrupted by some question of higher privilege.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to ask a further question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. Is it not in the power of the House by its own action to defeat the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and give us a morning hour at this time?

The SPEAKER. That is a question which the gentleman can answer for himself. The majority of the House has it in its power to proceed with its business as it may see fit.

Mr. HOOKER. Then I hope the motion to go into Committee of the Whole will be voted down.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. BLOUNT; and upon a division there were—ayes 88, noes 73.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. CALKINS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. CALKINS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 82.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. CONGER called for the yeas and nays upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Upon ordering the yeas and nays, upon a division there were—ayes 32, noes 92.

So (more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 116, not voting 55; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6143) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The pending question was upon the following amendment offered yesterday by Mr. TUCKER:

Insert after the amendment last adopted the following:

And the proviso to the act entitled "An act to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879," approved December 21, 1878, shall be amended and re-enacted, as follows:

Provided, That no increase in the postal-car service beyond what has existed at some time during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1878, and ending June 30, 1879, shall be made during said fiscal year.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the figures "1878," in the third line, and inserting the words, "is hereby repealed." The effect of this amendment is to repeal the restrictive clause in the act referred to. That restriction prohibited the Post-Office Department from increasing the postal-car service beyond what it was on the 1st of December, 1878. This amendment, in repealing that restriction, leaves the Post-Office Department free to manage this service as it may think proper; but the Postmaster-General, in a conversation which I had with him this morning, said that he did not expect to increase the service beyond the existing appropriation. I think that my amendment, which leaves a discretion to the Department in this matter, is better than the amendment of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I think that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is ample for all purposes. We are aware that during the last year, by reason of an excessive use of the appropriation for this purpose, deficiencies have occurred. The Committee on Appropriations agreed—with unanimity so far as I could understand at the time—to this restrictive provision. It turns out that at the time it was adopted there were mails taken off certain lines. It was not the purpose of the committee to interfere with the service as it then stood.

The contrary was true. The agreement of the committee was to let that service alone. They believed it was excessive but they did not care to take away a service they had already given.

And the object of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] is just to leave it exactly where the committee intended. The language proposed does not meet the circumstances of the case, the committee not having been informed of them. The object of the amendment is to leave the postal-car service with all the increase the committee has given to it during this year—to let it stand there until the next fiscal year. I trust the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will be voted down and that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will be adopted.

Mr. FOSTER. My amendment comes in at the fifth line of the written amendment of the gentleman from Virginia and of the third line of the amendment in the RECORD. I ask the Clerk to read my amendment as it will be if adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the proviso to the act entitled "An act to provide for the deficiency in the appropriations for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879," approved December 21, 1878, is hereby repealed.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say a word further, Mr. Chairman, to meet the objection of my friend from Georgia. If he has a mind to put a restrictive clause on that amendment providing there shall be no deficiency caused thereby I will have no objection to it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will accept that proposition as that is the object I have in view, to avoid a deficiency.

Mr. FOSTER. Let the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] offer his restrictive clause.

Mr. HUNTON. Then I offer this as an addition to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment is pending, and further amendment is not in order.

Mr. FOSTER. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. I move, then, to add as follows:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall make no deficiency in the appropriation for the current fiscal year by placing postal-cars on any line.

Mr. BLOUNT. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. TUCKER. I wish to say that the modification of my friend from Virginia of the amendment of my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] is perfectly satisfactory to me, and I hope those who have the same purpose in view as I have in making my amendment will vote for the amendment as modified.

Mr. FOSTER's amendment to the amendment as modified was agreed to; and Mr. TUCKER's amendment, as amended, was then adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For route agents, $1,075,000.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I move the following amendment:

In line 71 strike out "and seventy-five thousand" and in lieu thereof insert "one hundred and twenty-five thousand;" so it will read:

One million one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is in accordance with the recommendation of the Department, and it is not a larger amount for this service than will be actually needed. There are already twelve hundred miles of railroad upon which service of this character cannot now be placed. The service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, the length of railroad miles of service, will be increased unquestionably by four thousand. The appropriation for the fiscal year 1879 is $1,030,000 for this item. The Department has already been compelled to discharge ninety-six clerks from the various classes of this service, postal route agents, &c., and it will be necessary to discharge at least sixty more during the present fiscal year, making a reduction of one hundred and fifty-six, unless the amount recommended here is increased by the amount I suggest, for the service in 1880 will be greatly enlarged.

I send to the Clerk's desk a letter received by me from the superintendent of railroad mail service, with the concurrence also of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, giving detailed information. Before they are read I wish to add that the service has been put on in Virginia, and it becomes more than ever necessary the Department shall have the amount I provide in my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

REDUCTIONS IN FORCE AND APPROPRIATIONS.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT OF RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1879.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal request of this date, I have the honor to inform you that there has been made the following number of retirements from this service since December 1, 1878, on account of the inadequacy of the appropriation and in compliance with a circular-letter issued from this office to the division superintendents under date of December 17, 1878, a copy of which is herewith inclosed:

Railway post-office clerks	40
Route agents	30
Mail-route messengers	9
Local mail agents	16
Total	95

In connection with the above, I desire to say that about sixty more employés will have to be retired in order to bring the number within the limits of the appropriation. If we are compelled to make still further reductions I fail to see how this can be done, unless we abandon the use of clerks and agents on some of the lines and send the mails in charge of baggagemen.

I would further state that there are at present twelve hundred miles of new service where there are no agents, and unless some provision is made whereby agents can be appointed, instead of reductions being made, it will cause the Department much annoyance and the people residing along the lines of these routes an unjust delay in receiving their mails.

In making the estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, they were made as close as they possibly could be. It is estimated that there will be in the neighborhood of four thousand miles of new railroads completed upon which service will be required and agents appointed, and if the full amount that was estimated by the Postmaster-General for route agents is not appropriated the greater portion of the new service cannot be properly performed.

There is a growing necessity for local agents, and reductions have been made in this branch of the service this year to bring it within the appropriation, and this to the detriment of the service, as there should be agents at junctions and all important points where mails are transferred.

It is my earnest desire that the full amount that was estimated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, be appropriated.

Very respectfully,

W. B. THOMPSON,
General Superintendent.

Approved:

THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOHN H. BAKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 17, 1878.

SIR: Referring to circular-letter from this office dated November 11, 1878, informing you that "the appropriations for the different classes of employés in this service are inadequate, and it will be necessary to soon make considerable reductions," you will please forward to this office as soon as it is possible to make it, a list of names of all railway post-office clerks, route agents, and local agents that can possibly be retired in your division without detriment to the service.

In making this list you will give the names of the least efficient. If by transfers from one route or railroad to another you can in any way improve the service you will make recommendations to that effect.

All employés dropped after December 1 up to January 1 will be accredited to each division; and if with those recommended for retirement the whole number does not sufficiently decrease the service, this office will make up the number to be dropped, assigning its quota to each division.

The full record of the employé must accompany the recommendation for retirement.

Very respectfully,

W. B. THOMPSON,
General Superintendent.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the attention of the committee to the letter which has been read at the desk and to the speech of the gentleman from Indiana.

The proposition before this House is not how much shall be spent during the fiscal year 1878 for the service to which the letter that has been read relates, but it is as to what the service shall be for the year 1880. I want to say, however, before going to what that service shall be in 1880, that what is disclosed by that very communication manifests the purpose that I charged yesterday in relation to other branches of the service when I said that the Department had disregarded the will of this House in the matter of expenditures.

The House had provided that there should be used for this year the sum of $1,030,000; and by the statement of the gentleman from Indiana they have employed more than ninety persons beyond the number authorized by law; and they have got to turn them loose again unless we add more to the appropriation. Now, sir, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that during the last year, the year 1878, these very route agents were increased beyond what they had been for a number of years. A statement on page 232 of the report of the Postmaster-General discloses that in the year 1875 there was a decrease in the compensation of route agents. In 1876 there was an increase of $43,000; in 1877 an increase of $19,000; in 1878 an increase of $34,000. And the number of employés in 1875 was increased by 51; in 1876 there was an increase of 30; in 1877 there was an increase of 48; and in 1878 there was an increase of 78 persons; and the increase during this fiscal year has been in the same proportion. The increase for the next fiscal year is in like proportion. And yet notwithstanding this large, liberal percentage of increase that we have been voting for the years 1878 and 1879, and are proposing now, we are actually told that the Department is expending more, going beyond the appropriation, in the employment of men by scores, and making its way as rapidly as it can toward deficiencies. In the railway service, the steamboat service, the employment of route agents, whenever they please, they go on and employ men in violation of the law and then hold up that very thing to the House as a rebuke.

Sir, I do trust that this House will stand by the action of the Committee on Appropriations. We have taken into consideration the growth of this service year by year; and the fact that the superintendent of mail transportation has employed so many more men this year than he was authorized by law to employ, and that he must therefore discharge some of them, has nothing to do with the service for the year 1880.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If the gentleman from Georgia had permitted the letter that I sent to the Clerk's desk to be read, he would have been able to give a better analysis of its contents than he has. The letter refers distinctly to the wants of the service for the year 1880. And I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Post-Office Department does not violate the law, as charged by the gentleman from Georgia, in regard to this service, to the extent of one single cent. They have obeyed the law. The fact is, that there was not last year a sufficient amount of money appropriated for this branch of the service to meet the absolute requirements of the public; and when it was discovered that the service then existing was so large that it could not be carried through the fiscal year on that basis, they found it necessary to cut down the service. The gentleman will find that at the end of the year 1878 the service was less than at the end of the year preceding.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman from Indiana mean to say there was not more appropriated?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I have not time to yield.

The complaint that the service grows is a complaint that cannot be fairly laid to the charge of the Post-Office Department. The population of the country increases more than twelve hundred thousand a year. The number of miles of railroad increases more than four thousand miles a year. The whole service of the country increases. And to talk about there being seventy-eight more men employed now than there was a number of years back is a species of argument that would go to show, if it showed anything, that we ought to bring back the postal service to the limits within which it was confined in the days of George Washington, when we had seventy-five post-offices and about four or five thousand miles of post-routes.

As suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] there are twelve hundred new towns springing up every year; more than twelve hundred new post-offices are established every year; and the business of the railroad transportation of mails increases to the extent of at least 8 per cent. every year. And is it possible that this service can be provided on the principle that seems to guide the conduct of my friend from Georgia of cutting down year by year, instead of taking into consideration the natural and necessary increase of this service with the growth and development of our great and growing country?

While I believe in economy I am opposed to this pinching parsimony that would deny the people the benefits that would be derived from this great disseminator of intelligence and this great avenue for the purpose of enlarging the business of the country. Let us have an appropriation, Mr. Chairman, that shall be equal to the wants of this service; an appropriation that shall be equal to the wants of the people, and I for one will ask not a dollar more. But I insist on having as much as my own conscientious convictions resulting from a careful study of this question satisfy me is sufficient; and I trust my colleagues on the floor of the House will stand by me in seeing to it that neither this nor any other branch of the postal service for the year 1880 shall be crippled.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] has already said a good deal of what I intended to say in support of his amendment. I live in a large commercial city that is largely interested in the efficiency of the postal service, and I have had occasion, therefore, to give this matter some little personal observation, the result of which is I have become satisfied that the increase asked for by the gentleman from Indiana is one absolutely required for the interests and efficiency of this most important branch of the public service.

I would remind the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] as the gentleman from Indiana has already done, that the world moves; this country is growing; new towns and cities are springing up everywhere; new mail-routes are being established, and we are extending mail facilities all over the continent. It is not surprising, therefore, that the number of employés in the Post-Office Department has increased in the past few years. It is very reasonable to suppose that if we continue to extend mail facilities in 1880 as we have heretofore done, a still larger increase will be necessary in all the branches of the postal service both as to clerks, route agents, and every other kind of employés.

There is no department of the Government that should be protected and fostered by liberal appropriations more than our postal service. There is none that more directly promotes the interests of the people and the prosperity of the whole country than that.

I have complaints coming to me almost every day from my district of the imperfect and irregular delivery of the mails. On inquiry at the Post-Office Department, I am informed by the officials there that it is utterly impossible for them to discharge their duties faithfully and efficiently with the present force of employés. I know nothing about deficiencies created by violations of previous laws, but I am perfectly satisfied from the personal examination which I have given to the subject that the appropriation asked for by the gentleman from Indiana is a proper one and it ought to be made. It is not wise economy to curtail the postal service in any particular, and it is not a character of reform that the people of this country desire or that they will approve. I hope, therefore, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] will be adopted.

Mr. FORT. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, while I desire that the Post-Office Department should be conducted with strict economy, I may say that so far as my own district is concerned it seems that a larger appropriation is necessary.

There is a new railroad running through my district with regular trains, which has been in operation for nearly one year, upon which there is no accommodation at all, no mail messenger, no person whatever to take charge of the mails, and we are informed that it is impossible to put the service on that road until the appropriations are increased.

Now, sir, for one I say that while railroads are supplied with route agents in other parts of the country, it is certainly right and reasonable that they be put upon this road.

Mr. HUMPHREY. What is the length of that line?

Mr. FORT. I cannot tell exactly, sixty or seventy miles, and trains run upon it twice a day, and there is no mail agent at all and the people living upon that line are entitled to be served with mails as others are, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to support the amendment which is now pending because I think it is an absolute necessity. I have not at all before interfered with this bill, although it is one that has a very great interest especially in the large frontier States lying on a railroad, and one of which I have the honor in part to represent here.

During the last year there has been built in Minnesota three hundred and eighty-eight miles of railroad—a larger length of railroads has been built in Minnesota by three hundred miles than in any other State. On this three hundred and eighty-eight miles there is no route agent, no mail messenger, and we are unable to get a single messenger appointed, because there is no money wherewith to pay the salaries; and, as the gentleman from Illinois has remarked, some of these routes pass through the older portions of the State. These roads have been built by the men along the line of the roads and are not land-grant railroads. They have been built through the older portions of the State, the middle, and where they anticipated at once mail facilities and expect mail routes and mail facilities.

I called upon the Postmaster-General and urged that upon one of these lines, sixty-six miles in length, they should put at least a messenger to take care of the mail-pouches. The reply was that there was no money at all wherewith to pay for this service.

This additional amount asked for in this amendment is declared to be a necessity. Wherefore seek to avoid it? It is not good legislation. The Government is able to pay for this service. There is no deficiency in the Treasury that calls upon us to hold back $50,000, when that $50,000 is needed to perfect any given branch in the service.

I trust there will be no objection to the proposed amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the committee come to a vote I desire to disabuse the minds of the House in the matter of an increase in this service.

The gentleman from Indiana in his speech said that the post-office service grew with the population and material interests of the country, and that therefore he was opposed to such a proposition as that of the gentleman from Georgia to cut down this service, intimating to this House that the Committee on Appropriations, or the majority of it, were asking for a reduction.

In order that this may be understood I will state that in 1875 there was a positive decrease in the appropriation in the compensation of route agents. In 1876 it was $43,761; in 1877 the increase was $93,508; in 1878, $34,150; and in this bill we propose to increase it $45,000. This is the cutting down that the gentleman from Indiana objects to.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] reminds me of the fact that the service is growing and that we cannot afford to cut it down, and he knows something about it.

The Committee of the Whole will therefore see that instead of there being a reduction in the amount appropriated under this head, the amount contained in this bill is larger than the amount which has been appropriated for the same service for a period of years—larger than the amount appropriated for 1878, when provision was made for an increase to the extent of seventy-eight men. Perhaps my friend from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] thinks that a long time ago, to go back to last year; that we might just as well go back to the time of George Washington. But the report to which I refer is the last giving us tables showing the expenditures. Gentlemen cannot give any reason for the proposed increase except a sort of general complaint that they want to put in service a lot of men and they cannot get it done because there is no money to pay them.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and of the Committee of the Whole to this proposition, that it is cheaper to give the money and employ the necessary route agents and mail messengers than it is to perform the pouch service of these roads without the mail messengers. To illustrate, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] says that there are in his State more than three hundred and eighty miles of railway without mail messengers or route agents. They have there what is called the pouch service. The train starts with pouches made up for the different offices, to be thrown off when those offices are reached. At each office various pouches are made up with the mail for the other offices along the line of that road. The baggage-master throws off the pouches as he reaches the different places.

Now, gentlemen can see at once that the weight of these mail-sacks is three or four times what it need be and what it would be if there were a mail messenger on the road to take charge of the mail sacks upon them and distribute the mails, in which case there would be no necessity for any considerable number of sacks. With mail messengers the compensation to the railroad company and the weight of the mail-sacks would be less than in the case of pouch service. Therefore where the railroad service is used the route-agent and mail-messenger service should be employed rather than pouch service. In the interest of economy, of dollars and cents, this amendment ought to be adopted.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, to increase the appropriation for route agents from $1,075,000 to $1,125,000; and upon a division it was agreed to—ayes 106, noes 70.

Mr. BLOUNT. I give notice that I will call for a separate vote in the House.

The Clerk read the following:

For local agents, $120,000.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "$120,000" and inserting "$130,000." I move the amendment for the purpose of making some remarks which I was not allowed to make on Saturday last. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] at that time made the following remarks, which I read from the RECORD:

> Then, too, comes my friend from Idaho [Mr. FENN] making complaint. Why, Mr. Chairman, his Territory has more service and more frequently than many of the States of the Union. That little Territory, sparsely settled, far out on the frontier, has more service than many of the States, and yet the Delegate comes here and becomes furious over the economy of the Committee on Appropriations. In answer to what he said I had only to refer to existing facts.

In answer to what the gentleman there said I will refer to existing facts. I will refer to the report of the Postmaster-General, from which the gentleman has often read during this discussion, and to which authority I presume he will bow with respectful deference.

The gentleman from Georgia says that the Territory of Idaho is a "little Territory" "far out on the frontier." I wish that gentleman to bear in mind that the Territory of Idaho has a greater extent by six thousand square miles than all the New England States, New Jersey, Maryland, and Delaware combined. It has over 40 per cent. larger area than the State of Georgia. That is the "little Territory of Idaho."

As shown by the report of the Postmaster-General that I hold in my hand, and from which the gentleman from Georgia has so often quoted, it appears that the Territory of Idaho has 1,928 miles of star mail service; no railroad service at all as shown by the report of the Postmaster-General. The total annual actual service in Idaho amounts to 437,698 miles, less than the postal service of any State in the Union except the little State of Delaware, which would not make a fraction of a county in our Territory. [Laughter.]

During the winter of 1862-'63 I lived in the town of Florence, in Idaho Territory, a town which had a population of over one thousand. During that winter I paid $2 for every letter and $1 for every newspaper that I received through a private expressman. And if by raising my voice here I can prevent it I do not intend that the people of my Territory to-day shall suffer as I and my friends at Florence suffered in 1862-'63 for want of star mail service.

Mr. FENN. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following:

Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General:

For manufacture of adhesive postage-stamps, of official stamps, and of newspaper and periodical stamps, $92,000.

Mr. LATHROP. I move to amend the paragraph just read by adding to it that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

If said stamps can be furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department at less than the same now cost, the work of printing the same shall be given to said bureau, when not in violation of existing contract.

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the point of order on that amendment, that it is a change of existing law.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. It proposes to reduce expenditures.

Mr. BLOUNT. It does not appear that it retrenches expenditures.

Mr. LATHROP. My proposition is to give this work to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing only when so doing will save money to the Government. If that is not in the direction of economy I would like to know what is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to determine by the amendment whether it would save money or not.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The very words of the amendment will show that.

Mr. BLOUNT. The amendment may be unobjectionable, but we have no information from the Department upon the subject, and I must insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not rule the amendment out of order; there may be economy in it.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the manufacture of postal cards, $200,000.

Mr. LATHROP. I offer another amendment of the same character as the one just adopted. I move to amend by inserting at the end of the clause just read the following:

If such postal cards can be produced and furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department at less than the same now cost, the work shall be given to said bureau when not in violation of existing contracts.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Before this amendment is voted upon I wish to submit a single suggestion. I intended to say something upon a similar amendment touching stamps; but the vote was taken before I could get an opportunity.

These amendments provide that the work shall be given to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing if it can be done by that bureau at "less than the same now costs." Now take the item of stamps. Under the contract prior to the present one——

Mr. BLOUNT. Can the gentleman state when the present stamp contract will expire?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I think in about a year. I am not sure as to that, however.

Under the former contract for stamps, as I now recollect, the compensation paid for furnishing them was fourteen cents a thousand. It is now a little less than ten cents a thousand. What the contract is for postal-cards, I cannot just now state; but no doubt, as in the case of stamps, it is much less than the price under the former contract.

Now, for one, I am not willing to say that when the existing contract expires the Government shall not invite competition for a new contract, provided the Bureau of Engraving and Printing will do the work for a shade less than the price now paid. I think it very likely that upon proposals for a new contract the stamps may be printed and the postal-cards manufactured at less than the present rate. I am not willing, therefore, to tie the hands of the Department by the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he considers that the hands of the Department would be tied by this proposition?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. As I understand, you cannot by this amendment interfere with any contract now in existence; but when the existing contract expires, if the Bureau of Engraving and Printing will do the work for a thousandth part of a cent less than is now paid by contract the Department will be prohibited from having the work done even at a cheaper price by an outside party upon a new contract.

Mr. FINLEY. How are we to know that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing can do the work for less? How is that to be ascertained?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I accept the gentleman's question as an argument against the amendment. I think it is a very pertinent one.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of agent and assistants to distribute postal-cards, and expenses of agency, $7,300.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I move to amend by adding after the clause just read the following:

Provided, That from and after the passage of this bill all appointments in the Post-Office Department shall be apportioned among the different States and Territories and the District of Columbia according to population.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Several MEMBERS. Make it now.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point of order that the amendment changes existing law. Besides I do not think it right in principle, because it tends to embarass the executive department of the Government.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. It may be that the amendment is not correct in principle, though I think it is; it is certainly not open to the point of order which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] suggests. It does not propose to change any existing law, for there is now no law on the subject, but the whole matter of appointments is within the discretion of the Postmaster-General. This amendment corresponds precisely with the provision of law now in force in reference to the Treasury Department; I have copied the precise language of that act from the statute.

Now, it is very well known that a good many of the States of this Union are not being fairly dealt with by the Government in respect to appointments—especially Ohio, Virginia, and perhaps Maryland. Everybody is aware that these States are hardly represented at all in the administration of the Government. As to my own State I have nothing to complain of; we have perhaps more than we are entitled to, as we have the Postmaster-General and the Solicitor of the Post-Office Department; and these are probably all we have a right to ask. But I have some concern for gentlemen who represent other States—Illinois for instance, represented by the gentleman on my left, [Mr. EDEN,] who is too modest to ask for anything. It seems to me that this regulation might just as properly prevail in reference to the Post-Office Department as in regard to the Treasury Department. I think it a proper and just provision as applied to any Department of the Government, and I can see no reason why any gentleman on this floor should oppose it. Every section and locality in a republican government should be fairly and as nearly as possible equally represented in the administration of its affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] insist on his point of order?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question being taken, the amendment was declared not agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I call for a division. This amendment ought to be adopted.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 49, noes 53.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WADDELL. I desire to offer an amendment under instructions from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; and I ask unanimous consent to insert it in a portion of the bill already passed—at the end of line 20 on page 2.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I will hear the amendment read, reserving the right to object.

Mr. WADDELL. Certainly. The gentleman will not object when he hears it.

At the end of line 20, page 2, insert the following:

For preparing and publishing a new edition of the laws and regulations of the Post-Office Department, $20,000, of which sum $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be paid upon the order of the Postmaster-General and in his discretion to such officers of the Department as he may designate to prepare and superintend the publication of the volume: Provided, That the time so employed shall in no wise interfere with the regular duties of such officers; the appropriation herein provided for to be immediately available.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I have no objection to that; I believe it is necessary.

Mr. ATKINS. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, there is already sufficient clerical force to prepare it without paying some man $2,000 to do it. It can be done by the Postmaster-General's private secretary, or by his law clerk.

Mr. WADDELL. It requires some skill to perform this work. It is a modification of all the laws and regulations of the Department. There has been no publication since 1873. All the post-offices in the country are in a state of confusion about the rules in the Department and what the law is, and it requires something beyond mere clerical ability to perform the duty, and of course it ought to be paid for if done by a competent person. I should think the $2,000 allowed the Postmaster-General to be applied to that purpose is not too much.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no instructions from the committee on the subject. I concur with the gentleman from North Carolina in reference to this book. It contains all the postal laws and regulations, and is of great value and convenience to every member of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not object to the book.

Mr. BLOUNT. Often and again I have had occasion to use it. In making investigations in reference to the law I have had to go through the Revised Statutes, and very often have had great difficulty in finding what I wanted. This book is of great convenience, and, as stated, has not been published since 1873, and I hope the House will adopt the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT moved the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. EDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6143) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. BLOUNT. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask for a separate vote on each amendment.

First amendment:

At the end of line 20, page 2, add the following:

For preparing and publishing a new edition of the Laws and Regulations of the Post-Office Department, $20,000; of which sum $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be paid upon the order of the Postmaster-General and in his discretion to such officers of the Department as he may designate to prepare and superintend the publication of the volume: Provided, That the time so employed shall in no wise interfere with the regular daily duties of such officers. The appropriation herein provided for to be immediately available.

Mr. BLOUNT. We have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

At the end of line 32 add the following:

Provided, That from and after April 1, 1879, the post-office employés on railroads who receive mail matter and cancel the stamps thereon shall keep an account of the stamps so canceled by them, and the same shall be credited to the postmasters at the stations where such mail matter is placed on the cars, respectively, in making a basis for fixing the salaries of said postmasters.

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

In line 34, page 2, strike out "$460,000" and insert "$600,000;" so it will read: For the compensation of clerks in post-offices, $3,600,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. On this I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 121, nays 109, not voting 58; as follows:

Mr. THOMPSON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Fourth amendment:

In line 35, page 2, strike out "$1,900,000" and insert "$2,000,000;" so it will read:

For payment to letter-carriers, $2,000,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I demand the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The House divided; and there were ayes 34; not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. SINGLETON called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. THOMPSON were appointed.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. THOMPSON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The fifth amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was read, as follows:

At the end of the first paragraph, under the head of office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General, insert the following:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General may use such portion of the postal-car-service appropriation as may be spared from it to supply any deficiency that may arise from insufficient appropriations in the item for railway transportation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The sixth amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was read, as follows:

To the end of the amendment just read add the following:

Provided, That hereafter in making his estimates for railway mail service the Postmaster-General shall separate the estimate for the postal-car service from the general estimates; and in case any increase or diminution of service by postal cars shall be made by him the reasons therefor shall be given in his annual report next succeeding such increase or diminution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The seventh amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was read, as follows:

Insert after the amendment last adopted the following:

And the proviso to the act entitled "An act to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879," approved December 21, 1878, is hereby repealed: Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall make no deficiency in the appropriation for the current fiscal year by placing postal cars on any line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The eighth amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was read, as follows:

In the fourth paragraph, under the head of office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in lines 51 and 52, strike out "$5,690,663" and insert "$5,900,000;" so that it will read:

For inland mail transportation, namely: For transportation on star routes $5,900,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 172, nays 53, not voting 63; as follows:

Mr. BURCHARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The session of this evening was assigned by order of the House for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Commerce.

SURVEY OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. REAGAN. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War of January 10, 1879, concerning the duplication of the survey of the Mississippi River by the Coast Survey, have directed me to report the same back with a recommendation that the coast survey above New Orleans be suspended, and to move that the communication and accompanying papers, together with the report, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the communication, with the accompanying papers and report, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SITES OF FORTIFICATIONS ON DELAWARE RIVER.

Mr. REAGAN. The Committee on Commerce have also directed me to report back a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter of the Chief of Engineers relative to estimates of amounts required for protection from overflow of sites of fortifications on the Delaware River. REGULATION OF STEAM AND SAIL VESSELS.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 5504) to amend section 4234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was read. It provides that section 4234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by substituting for the last paragraph of said section, beginning with the words "every such vessel" and ending with the word "offense," the following words:

Every sail vessel navigated without complying with the provisions of this and the preceding section, shall be liable to a penalty of $200; and every steam-vessel navigated without complying with the provisions of the preceding section, shall be liable to a penalty of $500, one-half of which penalties shall go to the informer, and for these respective penalties the vessels so navigated shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against by libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.

Mr. PAGE. I would like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I send up a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury which shows the necessity for the passage of this bill. I ask that the letter be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 10, 1878.

SIR: The question has arisen in the execution of the navigation laws as to whether the penalty provided by section 68, act of February 28, 1871, for steam-vessels violating the law with regard to lights, fog-signals, &c., is preserved in the Revised Statutes or not.

To definitely settle this question, and to free the execution of this law from all doubt, I have the honor to transmit herewith an amendment to section 4234, Revised Statutes, for the consideration of your honorable committee and presentation to the House of Representatives.

Any information which you may desire on this subject will be furnished by this Department.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF PRODUCTS OF FISHERIES.

Mr. REAGAN. The Committee on Commerce have directed me to report a joint resolution for securing reports of the products of the fisheries. This resolution has been prepared in the Treasury Department, and the committee recommend its passage. The resolution is accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 227) for securing reports of the products of the fisheries was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that the master of every vessel of the United States enrolled and licensed for employment in the fisheries, or for the coasting trade, and provided with a permit to touch and trade at foreign ports shall every year make out and deliver to the collector of customs at the home port of such vessels a record of the kind and amount of fish caught by such vessels and the regions where they were caught, and such other particulars as may be required in the form to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall deliver a record of the kind and amount of fish, if any, caught in foreign territory to make up her cargo; and if the master of any such vessel shall fail to deliver such record within one year from the date of her last license he shall be debarred from receiving a new license until such record shall have been produced, and be liable to a penalty of $50 which may be collected and distributed in the same manner as are the fines for violations of customs laws. The form and record of such report shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and all such records shall be returned by collectors of customs for filing in the Bureau of Statistics. The pecuniary penalty prescribed shall be subject to remission or mitigation by the Secretary of the Treasury if upon investigation he shall be satisfied that it was incurred without willful disregard of law.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLLECTION DISTRICT OF BEAUFORT, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 5743) to extend the customs collection district of Beaufort, South Carolina.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2557 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be so amended as to extend the collection district of Beaufort eastward to South Edisto River, so as to include all the waters of the Combahee River and the sounds and inlets on the coast between said river Edisto and the Back River in Georgia.

Mr. REAGAN. This bill is recommended by all the parties concerned. There are several letters accompanying the bill, and in order to save the time of the House I will state briefly the reasons for the passage of this bill. The collector of customs at Beaufort, the collector of customs at Charleston, from whose district this territory is to be taken, and also the Treasury Department recommend the passage of this bill. It is a matter of convenience and advantage to the shipping interest.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMALLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSES IN FLORIDA.

Mr. FELTON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back favorably and to move the reference to the Committee on Appropriations of the bills which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the titles of the bills, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3665) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house at the port of Punta Rassa, in Monroe County, Florida; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4184) to establish a light-house at Mosquito Inlet, Florida.

Mr. EDEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDEN. Will the reference of these bills to the Committee on Appropriations be received as an instruction to that committee?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Commerce by this bill recommend that a light-house be erected at the site named in the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Of course the Committee on Commerce do not have and do not assume the authority of instructing any committee. Since I have been here, for the last four years, the practice has been to refer to the Committee on Commerce all bills for erecting light-houses. I do not know how that practice came up, but I know such is the practice. If the Committee on Commerce report against the bill, that ends it. If they report favorably, the practice has been for them to report the bill back to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations for the consideration of that committee.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Why has that practice obtained?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the reason is that the Committee on Commerce have properly that character of business under consideration, and they inquire into the facts concerning the necessity of the proposed light-houses. The Committee on Commerce having reported in favor of the construction of a light-house, the bill then goes to the Committee on Appropriations, and if they see fit they report an appropriation for the purpose.

Mr. EDEN. The reason I made the inquiry is this, not because I want to antagonize these bills or because I know anything about them. If it is understood to be an instruction to the Committee on Appropriations, then I think we ought to investigate them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot say what the Committee on Appropriations might consider it. Of course the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce would have its due weight with the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REAGAN. The Committee on Commerce only passes its judgment upon the necessity of the work; as to whether the money shall be appropriated for it is a question for the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BURCHARD. If this bill should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and reported back by them, would it not be subject to a point of order?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. BURCHARD. Then I do not see the necessity of sending it to the Committee on Appropriations. Let the House pass upon the question. It seems to me that general appropriation bills are the bills for the Committee on Appropriations to consider. Their jurisdiction does not extend to all appropriation bills. The Committee on Pensions, as well as other committees of the House, every day report bills making appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] will remember that on all general appropriation bills points of order are usually reserved, and if there be any provision in the bill not authorized by law it is competent for any one member of the House to raise the point of order upon it, which, if it contains an appropriation, requires its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUBBELL. Since I have been in the House, I have watched these bills introduced and referred to the Committee on Commerce for the construction of light-houses, and have seen the Committee on Commerce examine into the necessity for them, and have seen these bills referred to the Committee on Appropriations. For the life of me I cannot see why these matters should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations any more than when the Committee on Commerce determines there is a necessity for making an appropriation for a harbor, that the bill appropriating money for such harbor should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. That was formerly the practice.

Mr. HUBBELL. Of course it used to be the practice; but I can see no reason why the Committee on Commerce should spend their time in examining into the necessity for such appropriations, as it is they only who are supposed to know whether or not they are necessary; and after they have determined that question why it should go to the Committee on Appropriations, for them to pass judgment on what the Committee on Commerce have recommended. Why should not the Committee on Commerce report bills making such appropriations for the action of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer the gentleman from Michigan that a report of the Committee on Commerce usually has great weight with the Committee on Appropriations. These bills, for instance, if a point of order was made against them, would go to the Committee of the Whole, and would probably never be reached; whereas if they go to the Committee on Appropriations, with a strong report as to their necessity from the Committee on Commerce, and if they are inserted by the Committee on Appropriations in a general appropriation bill, they do not often have points of order raised against such, and thus the construction of light-houses is facilitated.

Mr. EDEN. I withdraw any objection to the reference of the bill.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I desire to ask a question for information. Would it not be competent for the House to pass a bill on the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce without referring it to the Committee on Appropriations?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Commerce have not made that recommendation.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I make the parliamentary inquiry whether it would not be competent for the House to do so.

The SPEAKER. It would be competent for the House when the bill is reported to do so. The House can pass any bill when once within its control. Such a bill would, however, be subject to a point of order.

Mr. BURCHARD. And then it would be the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to report an appropriation in the general appropriation bill, unless they thought in the interest of economy the money should not be appropriated?

The SPEAKER. No; such a bill would have to pass the Senate and be signed by the President before it would have any compulsory force on the Committee on Appropriations or be free from points of order. The Chair does not recollect that points of order have ever been taken on appropriations for light-houses when reported in sundry civil appropriation bills.

Mr. HUBBELL. They are subject to points of order.

The bills were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

TRANSPORTATION OF GOODS.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the memorial of M. W. Galt and others, citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, for transportation of goods on equal terms with other cities.

The memorial was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the memorial was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANCLOTE A PORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. DUNNELL also, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4056) making Anclote, in the county of Hernando, in the State of Florida, a port of entry.

The bill was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF CITIZENS OF ALLEGHENY COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. DUNNELL also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2218) for the relief of certain citizens of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF NAME OF BARGE.

Mr. DUNNELL also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 5633) authorizing the changing the name of the barge Cockade City, of Washington, District of Columbia, to Republic.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to allow the owners of the barge Cockade City, a vessel or boat of American ownership and license, to change her name, and hereafter be known as the Republic.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. DUNNELL also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 5824) extending the limits of the port of New York.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the collection district of the port of New York shall hereafter include, in addition to the other territory embraced therein, all that part of the county of Hudson, in the State of New Jersey, and the waters adjacent, now within the collection district of Newark, New Jersey.

The assistant collector at Jersey City, authorized by section 2535 of the Revised Statutes, shall have power to enter and clear vessels, and perform all other acts which are allowed by law to be performed at a port of entry and delivery, under such instructions as he shall from time to time receive from the collector of the port of New York.

Mr. PEDDIE. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the bill (H. R. No. 5824) to extend the limits of the port of New York now under consideration, I desire to say that I have not had time to look into the merits of the bill. This I demand as a matter of justice and right due to my constituents. They have a deep interest in the subject-matter, but their views have not been presented; and hence I ask that the whole subject be recommitted.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from New Jersey to make that motion?

Mr. DUNNELL. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I desire to be heard for a moment upon this matter. The collection district of Jersey City has been for the last twenty years a disturbing element to the people, a part of its territory lying along the Hudson and Hackensack Rivers, and about twelve miles in extent, one-half of which is in the territory of Newark and the other in the port of New York. A bill is on the Calendar, reported by the Committee on Commerce, providing that the whole of Hudson County be made a port of entry. Objections having been made by certain citizens, I took the precaution to have a committee, headed by the ex-governor of the State and fifteen citizens, to examine into the whole subject and see at what conclusion they could arrive. No one can entertain more kindly feelings to my colleague who represents the Newark district than I, but my duty to my constituents has compelled me to differ with him. In order that we may harmonize on this question I have an amendment to offer, so that all the territory west of Newark Bay is to continue within the district of Newark, and that lying east of Newark Bay and the Hackensack River is to continue within the district of Jersey City.

I am in hopes that the amendment will be satisfactory to my colleague, and I offer it.

Mr. PEDDIE. I withdraw my motion to refer the bill, for the purpose of hearing the amendment read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amend, in seventh line, after the words "New Jersey," by inserting "east of Newark Bay and the Hackensack River."

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I think that will cover the point aimed at.

Mr. PEDDIE. I accept the amendment, which I think will be satisfactory to my constituents.

The question was taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. HARDENBERGH, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I understand that the Treasury Department objects to the second section of the bill. I have no wish that this bill should go to the Senate and then come back to the House with an amendment. There was no objection to the first section. Grant us that, and we will take time to complete another section. I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. What is the second section of the bill? Let it be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the second section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The assistant collector at Jersey City, authorized by section 2535 of the Revised Statutes, shall have power to enter and clear vessels, and perform all other acts which are allowed by law to be performed at a port of entry and delivery, under such instructions as he shall from time to time receive from the collector of the port of New York.

Mr. KENNA. Who is to discharge the duties provided for in the second section of the bill?

The question was taken on Mr. HARDENBERGH'S amendment; and it was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARDENBERGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT CITY OF FREDERICTON.

Mr. DUNNELL also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 5881) authorizing the issue of an American register to the steamboat City of Fredericton, and to change the name of the same.

The report was read.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HUBBELL. I did not suppose that the passage of this bill would be pressed now. I would call the attention of the House to the report which has been read in connection with this bill. It does not show that this vessel is free from debt. It does not appear from the report that there are no charges against it. For aught we know the granting of an American register to this foreign-built vessel may tend to deprive some parties of their just rights. I hope the bill will not be passed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am answered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LORING] that there are no charges against this boat. She runs upon the Merrimac River, and is used simply for excursion purposes. She is substantially constructed by American labor, and has been largely repaired by American capital; only the keel was really laid upon English soil.

Mr. HUBBELL. I move that the bill be recommitted; and upon that motion I shall call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] yield for that purpose?

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not. I call the previous question on the engrossment of the bill.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 68, noes 9.

Mr. HUBBELL. No quorum has voted.

Mr. DUNNELL. I trust the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] will not raise the point that there is no quorum voting. He is aware that we have some important bills to report to-night. This bill is reported with the favorable recommendation of a majority of the committee of which he is a member.

The SPEAKER. The point of order having been raised that no quorum voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. HUBBELL. I requested that this bill be held back to-night and not reported.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am informed that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] understood that I would not report this bill to-night. I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill.

There was no objection, and the bill was accordingly withdrawn.

OPERATIONS OF LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD IN MINNESOTA AND WISCONSIN.

Mr. DUNNELL also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 5030) to extend the operations of the Light-House Board over the Saint Croix River and Lake in the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin, and the Chippewa River in the State of Wisconsin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the jurisdiction of the Light-House Board, created by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes," approved July 31, 1852, is hereby extended over the Saint Croix River and Lake in the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin, and the Chippewa River in the State of Wisconsin, for the establishment of such lights, day-beacons, and buoys as may be necessary for the use of vessels navigating said rivers and lake.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out "July" and insert "August."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEELE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OAKLAND, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. REA, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 2080) to constitute Oakland, in the State of California, a port of delivery; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. REA moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DAY BEACON, SAN FRANCISCO HARBOR.

Mr. REA also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury recommending an appropriation of $1,500 to complete the establishment of a day beacon on Anita Rock, San Francisco Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. REA also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2985) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Lexington, Missouri.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Chillicothe and Des Moines City Railroad Company be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge, and approaches thereto, over the Missouri River, at such point as it may select, at or within twelve miles of Lexington, in the county of La Fayette, in the State of Missouri. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and, at the option of the corporation by which it may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot-passengers.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroad or public highways leading to the said bridge; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States.

SEC. 3. That if said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, the spans thereof shall not be less than three hundred feet in length in the clear, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river. The lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least fifty feet above extreme high-water mark as understood at the point of location, and the bridge shall be at right angles to, and its piers parallel with, the current of the river: Provided, That if the same shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the draw or pivot shall be over the main channel of the river at an accessible navigable point, and the spans shall not be less than one hundred and sixty feet in length in the clear, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with, and the bridge itself at right angles to, the current of the river, and the spans shall not be less than ten feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge: Provided, also, That said draw shall be opened promptly, upon reasonable signal, for the passing of boats; and said company or corporation shall maintain at its own expense, from sunset till sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe. No bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river; and if any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, obstruct such navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridge. And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the district court of the United States of the State of Missouri in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located.

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use, shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War, upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

SEC. 5. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and, to secure that object, the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of one mile above and one mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War, the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The Clerk read the report. It states that the committee caused the bill to be submitted to the Secretary of War for information touching its provisions and received communications from him and from Charles R. Suter, major of engineers, in charge of the Missouri River, by which it appears that the provisions of the bill are approved and deemed amply sufficient to protect the interests of navigation. Under the provisions of the bill the bridge, at the option of the corporation by which it is built, may be used for the passage of wagons, vehicles, animals, and foot-passengers; and for this reason the committee recommend that the bill be amended by adding the following as a new section:

SEC. 7. If said bridge shall be built for the passage of wagons, vehicles, animals, and foot-passengers, then the Secretary of War shall have authority, and it shall be his duty, upon the petition of citizens wishing to use the bridge, to fix the rates of toll for wagons, vehicles, animals, and foot-passengers over said bridge; and he may change the same from time to time as justice and right may require.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. REA] in reference to the amendment. This bridge, as I understand from the reading of the bill, is to be built by a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri; and it occurs to me if any person or officer is to have authority to fix the tolls, that to give such authority to the Secretary of War would be sending the people of that neighborhood a long distance from home in order to get justice done them.

Mr. REA. I will state to the gentleman that in all the bills which have been passed here authorizing the building of bridges by railroads, there has been, so far as I have examined them, a provision that all the railroads terminating at the point designated for the erection of the bridge might use the road upon the payment of proper compensation, and in case of disagreement between the companies as to the compensation to be paid, it has been left to the Secretary of War to fix that compensation. It occurs to me, therefore, as proper that the Secretary of War should be authorized in this case to fix the compensation for passengers, vehicles, &c.

Mr. EDEN. The section to which my remarks refer is that relating to the fixing of tolls for wagons, vehicles, foot-passengers, &c. There might be a very good reason why the Secretary of War should settle the rate of toll as to these great railroad corporations; but when the question is one as to the rights of private parties using a bridge, it occurs to me that the settlement of the question should be referred to some officer or tribunal more accessible to the people of the vicinity than the Secretary of War.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The gentleman is right; this question ought to be referred to the governor of the State.

Mr. POLLARD. I will state that the corporation asking the building of this bridge derives its charter both from the State of Missouri and the State of Iowa. Hence the propriety of the provision.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The use of this bridge for the passage of teams, &c., will be a matter entirely within the State of Missouri; the bridge will probably be a distance of one hundred miles from the line of the State of Iowa.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. A greater distance than that.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I entirely concur, therefore, with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] that this question as to the tolls to be paid by the people crossing this bridge in wagons or on foot ought to be regulated by some home authority, as such things are regulated everywhere else. The governor of the State of Missouri ought to have the control of this question.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I think there is a law of the State of Missouri regulating the charges upon these bridges; I am not certain about that; but if there is not, there should be some provision in this bill in reference to the matter.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. If we do not legislate at all on the subject the local law, whatever it is, will control this matter; but if we undertake to legislate and to designate the officer who shall fix the rates of toll, our action may control.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The Legislature of Missouri should have full control over this matter.

Mr. EDEN. I shall be compelled to vote against the bill if this amendment be adopted. I think the State of Missouri should have the exclusive right to regulate matters of this sort.

The SPEAKER. If the House disapproves the amendment, it can vote it down.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "the Secretary of War" and inserting, "the Legislature of the State of Missouri."

Mr. EDEN. The Legislature can regulate this matter without asking any authority from us; they have such authority already. All that is necessary is that we omit this provision about the Secretary of War.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. It will not do any harm to insert the language suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.]

Mr. REA. So far as I am concerned I assent to the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.]

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CRITTENDEN] certainly does not intend to insert an amendment by which Congress would undertake to confer upon the Legislature of Missouri authority to regulate the tolls upon a bridge crossing a river within that State.

Mr. ELAM. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that in the absence of any provision conferring authority upon the Secretary of War it would naturally follow that this corporation, operating a bridge within the State of Missouri, would be controlled by the Legislature of that State.

Mr. REAGAN. If the corporation is allowed to build the road, and nothing is said about the right of regulating tolls, a legal question will be raised which may be productive of difficulties. It can do no harm to the State to recognize this subsequent auxiliary action on the part of the State government without trenching on the reserved powers of the States. It cannot have that effect, but simply looks to the auxiliary action of the State for the benefit of the people. I think there can be no objection to it. This recognizes the right of the State and avoids the legal difficulty which otherwise might arise.

Mr. EDEN. Does the gentleman from Texas maintain that Congress can confer on the Legislature of Missouri this power?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not say Congress can require the Legislature to take this action, but Congress can recognize the authority on the part of the Legislature without trenching on the rights or dignity of the State in any way.

Mr. EDEN. Has not the State of Missouri the power to do this without any authority being conferred by Congress?

Mr. REAGAN. Unless distinct provision is made for this regulation of tolls the persons who control these corporations, under the principles of the Dartmouth College case, are placed beyond the power of legislation, State or Federal; and if we do not reserve the right we get the people into difficulty and the corporation may levy any rates that they think proper. Congress may recognize the auxiliary action of a State. We do not give the authority, but simply recognize the authority of the State to protect the rights of its citizens.

Mr. EDEN. The difficulty about the argument of the gentleman from Texas consists in the fact that we are not creating this corporation at all that is to build this bridge. This corporation is the creature of the law of the State of Missouri, and the only reason why they come to Congress is because this river being a navigable stream they cannot build a bridge without the authority of Congress; and all that is necessary is the consent of Congress for the construction of the bridge. When we give that consent and put the necessary restrictions around the bill to protect the rights of commerce we have done all we have any right to do and the Legislature of the State of Missouri without coming to Congress to ask any questions has the right to regulate these tolls. When we undertake to say it may do it or it may not do it, we are trenching upon the rights of the State and do something we have no right to do.

Mr. REAGAN. I will only say one word in relation to what the gentleman from Illinois has now suggested. It is as to whether this bridge is built under the law and authority of the State or under the authority of the Federal Government. The object of this act of Congress is to enable the railroad company to build the bridge across that river. We propose to do that because the State of Missouri cannot do it, as that is a navigable river over which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction. It has that jurisdiction; and when the bridge is built, though it may be by a corporation whose existence is derived from laws of the State of Missouri, it is still under an act of Congress, and without this amendment there is no reservation of the right on the part of anybody else to protect the people there against the power of the corporation.

Surely, there can be no harm in protecting the people to the extent of the amendment which has been proposed with the modification accepted by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. REA,] which allows the Legislature of Missouri to regulate the rates of toll. It commands nothing; but it saves to the people the difficulty that might arise, that the right not being reserved to any one cannot be exercised by any one. It seems to me that the objection the gentleman makes defeats the very object he has in view, the protection of the people.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I desire to enlarge my amendment by moving to strike out the whole section.

The SPEAKER. The quicker mode would be to vote down the amendment if the gentleman wants that result reached.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Very well.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to make an inquiry. Is it intended to grant a power to the State of Missouri?

Mr. BRIGHT. As I understand the proposition I think it is a very simple one. Here is a national stream. Congress is appealed to for a privilege. That privilege is granted so as not to interrupt the commerce of the country; and the question or rather the duty of fixing the tolls is remitted to the State of Missouri. That is all there is in it, and I do not think there is any difficulty about it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to say one word. This is a matter for the State of Missouri, but it does seem to me that it would be better for the citizens of Missouri to have this amendment adopted. The railway corporation very possibly may claim that Congress has given them the power to have a bridge for wagons and foot-passengers, and has left them to charge precisely what they please in the matter of tolls; and some private individuals may have to carry the question to the courts of the United States; some private individual will have to contend with the corporation.

If the seventh section be put in the bill, nobody will ever have any doubt as to what Congress meant; and I think we may safely say that State-rights and anti-State-rights will neither of them be in the least danger of being hurt by this provision. It seems to me to be a very simple question, and that it is better to have the section in.

Mr. EDEN. Allow me to make this suggestion: if we give authority to this corporation to make this wagon road over the bridge, subject to the legislation of the State of Missouri to complete it, it leaves the whole matter in the hands of that Legislature, and that is all there is of it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. No right is absolutely given to make a wagon bridge. We put the power in the Legislature to regulate the tolls.

Mr. REA. It does seem to me that it is a clear proposition that if the Legislature now has that power independent of Congress, the passage of this section can do no harm.

Mr. STEELE. Do you not think that if any such assumption as this be made by Congress, it would be held as a precedent hereafter?

Mr. REA. The bill recognizes the right of the State, and saves all questions by the incorporation of that provision in the act. In my judgment it is very doubtful whether the State would have the right to build the bridge without the sanction of Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It seems to me that the question is a very simple one. Congress in passing this act takes cognizance and exercises its jurisdiction over this river. It has the power to delegate to the State Legislature of Missouri a particular duty the same as a State delegates questions to grant franchises for ferries to counties and the same as the United States gives jurisdiction to a State. Until it takes cognizance by exercising its jurisdiction itself there is no power which could be more safely exercised, from the fact that every individual injured by excessive tolls could go to the State courts and get justice and not be obliged to litigate in the courts of the United States. It seems to me there is no doubt about the power. It is one of the safest provisions we could incorporate in the bill.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move now to strike out in line 6, in the first section of the bill, the words "or within twelve miles of;" so that it will read:

That the Chillicothe and Des Moines City Railroad Company be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge, and approaches thereto, over the Missouri River, at such point as it may select, at Lexington, in the county of La Fayette, in the State of Missouri. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and, at the option of the corporation by which it may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot-passengers.

That fixes the bridge at Lexington, the leading and important town in that county. I think it will be better to fix it there at that point, as that is the main point in that county, than to carry it twelve miles above or below. I am unwilling to agree to one mile above or below but wish to have it at or as near Lexington as practicable. I will state that a better foundation can be had for a bridge at Lexington than at any other point for twelve miles above or below.

Mr. POLLARD. I am willing to admit that.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. As near as practicable.

Mr. POLLARD. Then say three miles.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I cannot consent to say three miles, because it might injure the town very much. I will say within the corporate limits of the town.

Mr. POLLARD. Make it larger than that.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I cannot consent to the distance of one mile above or below Lexington.

Mr. POLLARD. That will do.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Then say "at or near Lexington."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. I find here a provision that reads as follows: after the word "foot-passengers," "then the Legislature of the State of Missouri shall have authority, and it shall be their duty, to" do so and so. Now, I want to know whether the Congress of the United States has the right to direct the Legislature of Missouri as to what is their duty or not.

The SPEAKER. The amendment has already been adopted.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. Then I ask unanimous consent to strike out from the amendment the words "and it shall be their duty."

Mr. REA. I must object to that amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have another amendment which I wish to offer, to come in after line 12.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House the bill is not now amendable, but the gentleman can move a reconsideration of the vote by which it was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will make that motion in order that I may offer a simple amendment to it. It is to add the words:

Provided, That if said bridge is not completed within three years from the date of the passage of this bill, then the charter therein granted shall be forfeited.

Mr. ITTNER. I desire to know if the directory clause in the amendment was stricken out.

The SPEAKER. It was not.

The question was taken upon the motion to reconsider, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move to insert after line 12 of the first page the following:

Provided, That if said bridge is not completed within three years from the date of the passage of this bill the charter hereby granted shall be forfeited.

Mr. REA. I hope that amendment will not pass: three years is too short a time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will modify it and make it four years. I will state that the road has not been completed upon either side of the river, either at Lexington or on the other side of the river, and my object in moving this amendment is to prevent this or any other corporation from getting the privilege of building a bridge and holding it to be sold to somebody else. I think if Congress gives them the charter to build a bridge at this point they should do the work within a reasonable time, and I think four years is ample time.

Mr. POLLARD. If the gentleman had built many bridges across the Missouri River he certainly would not expect that this bridge could be built in three years. I most emphatically hope that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will state, if my colleague will permit me, that a bridge has been built in a district adjoining mine within two years.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I will state that Congress gave to a railroad company the right to build a bridge at Glasgow, and it was built within eight months after the charter was given them.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will accept the amendment to make the time four years.

The question was taken on Mr. CRITTENDEN's amendment as modified; and it was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. COLE. Would it be in order to move an amendment to the second section, to strike out that portion of it which instructs the Legislature of Missouri? It seems to me that the provision to instruct the Legislature of the State of Missouri to perform certain acts is not within our constitutional power.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman mistakes the language of the section. I do not think it is liable to that construction.

The Clerk read as follows:

If said bridge shall be built for the passage of wagons, vehicles, animals, and foot-passengers, then the Legislature of the State of Missouri shall have authority, and it shall be their duty, upon a petition of citizens wishing to use the bridge, to fix the rates of toll for the passage of wagons, vehicles, animals, and foot-passengers over said bridge. And the said Legislature may change the same from time to time as justice and right may require.

Mr. REAGAN. I trust that by unanimous consent the words "and it shall be their duty" will be struck out. They ought not to be in the section, and I did not know they were there.

Mr. REA. I ask that those words be struck out.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the section will be amended by striking out those words.

There was no objection; and the section was amended accordingly.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TWELVE-MILE BAYOU.

Mr. REA also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4878) to improve the navigation of Twelve-mile Bayou and the lakes between Shreveport, Louisiana, and Jefferson, Texas, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purpose of improving the navigation of Twelve-mile Bayou and the lakes between Shreveport, Louisiana, and Jefferson, Texas, by preventing the wasting of water from Soda Lake into Cross Lake, and to relieve the said city of Shreveport from miasmatic influences arising from the stagnant water of the lake known as Cross Lake, the overflowed lands in the bed of said lake, situated in townships 18, ranges 14, 15, and 16, and township 17, range 14, in the parish of Caddo, State of Louisiana, be, and the same are hereby, granted to John G. McWilliams, E. M. Smith, W. D. Wylie, R. B. Patterson, L. L. Tomkies, jr., B. F. Wharton, and W. S. Frierson, and their associates, their successors and assigns, upon conditions that said named persons, their successors and assigns, shall, within five years from and after the passage of this act, cause the water in said lake to be drained, and the land in the bed of said lake reclaimed from overflow, by building of the necessary levees and the making of proper drainage.

SEC. 2. That whenever said persons shall have complied with the provisions of this act, it shall be their duty to file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior a report, in writing, stating that the provisions of this act have been complied with; whereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall cause said work to be inspected by three competent engineers of the Army of the United States; and upon the report of such officers, showing that said persons have fully complied with the terms and provisions of this act, and have drained said lake and reclaimed said lands from overflow, the Secretary of the Interior shall execute and deliver to the said persons a patent for the land hereinbefore described; and the title to said land shall not vest in said persons until the execution and delivery of said patent.

SEC. 3. That if said persons shall fail to comply with the terms of the provisions of this act within five years after its passage, they shall forfeit all right to said land, or any part thereof; and it shall not be necessary in such case for a forfeiture to be declared by judicial process or legislative enactment.

SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to interfere with, or impair, any valid claim or claims to said land, or any part thereof, now held by any person or persons, State, or corporation.

SEC. 5. That the above-named persons shall, within twelve months from the date of the passage of this act, or as soon thereafter as practicable, incorporate themselves into a body politic and corporate, under the laws of the State of Louisiana, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act relating to the drainage of said lake.

Mr. REA. I ask that the report of the committee accompanying this bill be read.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to reserve a point of order on the bill until the report has been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2576) to incorporate the Cross Lake Canal and Drainage Company, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report as follows:

Cross Lake is a shallow lake in Caddo Parish, in the State of Louisiana, near the city of Shreveport, overflowing about eighteen thousand acres of land, as near as your committee can learn. The bill proposes to create a corporation in the State of Louisiana, for the purpose of draining said lake by means of a canal or ditch and levees, so as to reclaim the lands now covered and overflowed with water, and to grant to said corporation the overflowed lands in the bed of said lake, as a consideration for services rendered in draining said lake.

The committee caused the bill to be referred to the Secretary of the Interior for information touching its provisions, and received the following letter in answer thereto from the Commissioner of the General Land Office:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 29, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith my report upon House bill No. 2576, "to incorporate the Cross Lake Canal and Drainage Company," referred to me on the 12th instant by Hon. DAVID REA, of the Committee on Commerce, for an expression of my views.

The bill provides for the incorporation of a body politic created by the act, for the purpose of draining by means of a canal or ditch, with proper levees, &c., what is known as Cross Lake, covering a large portion of several townships of land in Caddo Parish, Louisiana, and for a grant of the lands thereby reclaimed to the company so created as a consideration for the completion of the work.

Mr. REA asks whether or not the bill properly defines the line between the surveyed land and the lake.

To this I have to answer that the meander lines of this lake were fixed by the survey of 1839, and the public lands bordering thereon have been thus far disposed of according to such plats of survey, except in township No. 18 north, of range 14 west, which was resurveyed in 1871, so far as respects the lake in that township, and the public surveys and subdivisional lines were extended over its bed, as shown on the diagram furnished herewith, and the newly-surveyed area thus formed has been treated as public land and subject to disposal since that date, some of it having already been entered.

It is not easy to fix upon the diagram the specified point of intersection named in the bill between Cross Lake and Twelve-mile Bayou, for the reason that said bayou appears to have been the original eastern boundary of the lake, and although meandered on its western bank, if bank it had, the same meander is shown as the eastern line of the lake, and the allottings of the public lands are made to bound on the eastern bank of the bayou, except a small distance at its entrance into Red River, in section 23, and the survey of 1871 abuts upon the western bank of the bayou as the boundary of the former lake bed. The point might be made definite by reciting its exact location by reference to the official plats of survey, and thus all misunderstanding be avoided.

Mr. REA also invites suggestions "as to the propriety of the passage of this bill."

Upon this point I would remark that I am not aware of any public interest that would require the creation of a body-corporate under United States laws to construct a small canal across a single township in one of the States of the Union, or justify the conferring of grants for such purpose similar to those bestowed upon the constructors of great national works of public improvement. Such local matters should in my judgment be left to the States, to be carried on by the municipal authorities more particularly interested, or in such other manner as any State by her Legislature shall specially direct.

The lands and lake lie along the line of the Vicksburgh and Shreveport Railroad grant of June 3, 1856; and a possible question of title under the statute may embarrass the attempt to bestow them in the manner provided in this bill.

But whatever may be said on this point, I consider the main question to lie upon the condition of these lands as the bed of an alleged shallow lake, a portion of which has already been subjected to the extension of the public surveys, and the whole of which is claimed to be susceptible of reclamation.

Upon lands in this situation I have fully expressed my views on page 11 of my last annual report, in which I recommend that whatever of title may still remain in the United States be surrendered by an act of Congress to the States respectively in which they may lie, leaving all further questions of right respecting them open for settlement by the proper judicial tribunal.

Not deeming this case in any manner an exception to the general class falling under such recommendation, I would favor its disposal in the same manner, either by special act or by public statute embracing the whole class.

I inclose the bill, with a copy of Mr. REA's communication.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. A. WILLIAMSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. C. SCHURZ,
Secretary of the Interior.

The title to unsurveyed overflowed lands in the bed of lakes covered with water remains in the United States and does not pass to the States in which they are situated under swamp-land grants. (See letter of Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated January 25, 1873, Ex. Doc. No. 31, third session Forty-second Congress.)

It is the opinion of the committee that the drainage of this lake would relieve the city of Shreveport and surrounding country to a very great extent from miasmatic diseases incident to that locality in consequence of decayed vegetation and stagnant waters. On this subject the committee beg leave to submit the following communication from the mayor of said city of Shreveport:

SHREVEPORT, LA., March 18, 1878.

DEAR SIR: On the part of the city of Shreveport, we would like to have you respectfully represent to the members of Congress that it is a matter of great importance that Cross Lake, near the city of Shreveport, should be drained, as it would add very materially to the general health of the city, and do away in a great measure with the miasma that caused the yellow fever and other miasmatic and other diseases so malignant in our vicinity, and would also give us some assurance of better navigation to Jefferson, Texas.

Yours, respectfully,

N. W. MURPHY, Mayor.

W. D. WYLIE, Esq.,
Washington City, D. C.

In the judgment of the committee, the building of the necessary levees to drain said lake will prevent the flowage of water from Twelve-mile Bayou into said Cross Lake, and will thereby improve the navigation of Twelve-mile Bayou and other waters between Shreveport and Jefferson, Texas.

There are precedents where the lands in the beds of lakes have been granted to counties for reclamation. (See act granting the lands in Beaver Lake, Indiana, to the county of Newton, in said State, United States Statutes at Large, volume 17, page 409; also act granting lands in bed of Tarkeo Lake in Holt County, Missouri, to said county, United States Statutes at Large, volume 16.)

It is the opinion of the committee that Congress has no constitutional power to create a private corporation within a State for such purposes as are proposed in this bill.

A careful consideration of this subject has satisfied the committee of the propriety of the proposed work. The committee therefore reports the accompanying bill as a substitute and recommends the passage of the same.

The substitute grants the overflowed lands in the bed of said lake to certain persons therein named, their successors and assigns, on the conditions that they shall within five years from the passage of the bill cause the water in said lake to be drained and the said lands reclaimed from overflow.

These persons are to be incorporated under the laws of the State of Louisiana for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the bill; and when the lake has been drained and the lands reclaimed and the terms of the bill have been complied with by said corporation, then it is their duty to make a report, in writing, to the Secretary of the Interior to that effect; whereupon it is made the duty of said Secretary to cause the work to be inspected by three competent engineers of the Army of the United States, and upon their report that the terms and provisions of the bill have been complied with and the lake drained and said lands reclaimed, then it is the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to execute and deliver to said persons a patent for said lands; and the title to said lands shall not vest in said persons until the execution and delivery of said patent. If said persons fail to comply with the terms of the bill within five years from its passage, they forfeit all right to said lands or any part thereof.

The rights of all valid claimants to any portion or part of said lands are reserved and protected by the bill.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CONGER. I reserve a point of order upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order has already been reserved by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.]

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, I cannot see any possible reason why, if this work should be done, (and it occurs to me it should be,) the land should not be granted to the State, or to the particular county interested, for this specific purpose. The grant should certainly not be made to four or five individuals.

The SPEAKER. The point of order applies equally, whether the grant be to individuals or to the State.

Mr. EDEN. In the present shape of the bill, I shall insist upon the point of order.

Mr. ELAM. What is the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is that the bill proposes to part with property of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the point of order will not be insisted upon.

The SPEAKER. The point of order has been reserved by two gentlemen—the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr EDEN.]

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say that the land referred to in this bill is immediately in the rear of the city of Shreveport; and it has generated yellow fever and other diseases there. It is now covered by a lake, but by ditching and draining it may be reclaimed and the healthfulness of the place thus promoted. The persons proposing to do this work think that the land reclaimed will pay for the expense of doing it. This land at present is worthless to the Government. The bill simply authorizes a corporation to reclaim this land and bring it into useful cultivation, thus promoting the healthfulness of the city of Shreveport, which is now endangered.

Mr. DUNNELL. If the point of order is to be insisted upon it is hardly fair to the committee, who have other business, to consume time in debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is always disposed to hear gentlemen upon a point of order; and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has been appealing to the two gentlemen who raised the point of order to induce them to withdraw it. The Chair does not think that this is indulging debate to an improper extent.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the business of the Committee on Commerce has been fixed for this evening's session by unanimous consent and under a suspension of the rules; if so, has not the rule requiring this bill to receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole been suspended?

The SPEAKER. The rules have only been suspended so far as to provide that this business shall be considered this evening. Of course in every other respect it is subject to the rules of the House.

Mr. MILLS. Some days ago when a bill in regard to issuing the bonds of the Government was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, I took the ground that it must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole because it disposed of property of the United States, but the Chair held that that measure was before the House by virtue of a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. Before the House for consideration. The Chair thinks that the gentleman does not state the position of the Chair correctly.

Mr. MILLS. The Chair will not deny that that bill was acted on in the House without any reference to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not certain that there was a point of order applicable to that bill.

Mr. ELAM. If this bill is before the House now for consideration, what is meant by consideration?

The SPEAKER. Bringing the bill up to be acted on—giving it a status in the House.

Mr. ELAM. And that implies that it is to be discussed. You cannot consider a proposition without discussing it. Now, I ask that the committee reporting this bill, as well as myself, who introduced it, be permitted to discuss it, so as to show its character and effect.

The SPEAKER. But the point of order is raised under Rule 112 that the bill disposes of some of the property of the United States, and therefore must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ELAM. What is the property referred to in this bill? Is it land? No, sir; it is water; we propose to make land by draining it.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman will amend the bill so as to give merely the water on this land to these parties I will not insist on the point of order.

Mr. ELAM. We want to divert the water of this land into the Twelve-mile Bayou, so as to improve the navigation of that stream and other waters between Shreveport, Louisiana, and Jefferson, Texas.

Mr. CONGER. So the land when you get the water off belongs to this corporation.

Mr. ELAM. When we get the water into the bayou then we have land, but not before.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is something which the United States owns, and he sustains the point of order.

The bill accordingly was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE WABASH RIVER.

Mr. REA also, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 5016) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Wabash River.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Palestine Bridge Company, a corporation organized under an act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, is hereby granted the right to construct an iron or wooden bridge for railroad purposes, or for railroad and highway purposes, and as a public highway, either with a draw or continuous span, as it may determine, across the Wabash River, at any point said corporation may select, at or within six miles of the town of Merom, in Sullivan County, State of Indiana: Provided, That the bridge to be constructed under the authority hereby granted shall not interfere with the free navigation of said stream beyond what is necessary in order to carry into full effect the rights and privileges hereby granted, and shall be built at right angles with the current of the stream where said bridge may be erected, and that a span of at least one hundred and seventy feet over the main channel of said stream shall be left between the piers of said structure: And provided further, That if said bridge shall be built with a draw of not less than one hundred feet in width, and said draw is kept in repair for the passage of boats at all times, the detention of passing said bridge shall not be construed as interfering with the navigation of the stream: And it is further provided, That said bridge shall be, and be considered, a legal structure, and shall be a post-road for the transmission of the United States mails: And provided further, That in case said bridge is built with a continuous span, the bridge shall be built at such height as not to interfere with the navigation of said river by steamboats.

SEC. 2. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving for the space of one mile above and one mile below the proposed location the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War, the bridge shall not be built. And the Secretary of War shall determine the proper length of the spans of said bridge, and the height thereof above high-water mark, and as to the plan of the bridge in all respects; and if it shall be found at any time that such bridge unnecessarily or materially obstructs navigation, he shall require the necessary changes to be made therein, in the interest of such navigation, at the expense of said company.

Mr. REA. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5016) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Wabash River, in the State of Indiana, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report that, after a consideration of the provisions of the bill and of the information brought before the committee, it is their opinion that the bill ought to be amended as follows:

In the third and fourth lines of the first section strike out the words "Palestine Bridge Company, a corporation organized under an act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "Bloomfield Railroad Company, organized under the law of the State of Indiana, and the Quincy, Payson and Southeastern Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the law of the State of Illinois, or either of them."

After the word "or" and before the word "corporation," in line 5, section 2, insert the word "companies;" and after the word "corporation" and before the word "shall," in said line 5, insert the words "or corporations or either of them."

At the end of the bill insert the words, "or companies, and said company or companies shall maintain at its or their own expense, from sunset till sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe."

When thus amended your committee recommend that the bill pass. The letter of the Secretary of War, dated June 7, 1878, and the letter of the Chief of Engineers, dated June 4, 1878, accompanying the report, are made a part thereof.

The question being taken on the amendments, they were severally agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Before the question is put on the engrossment and third reading of the bill I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of it one or two questions. I desire to ask whether this bridge is to be built according to specifications approved by the Secretary of War?

Mr. REA. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. Has the bill all the usual guards imposed in reference to such bridges in bills passed heretofore?

Mr. REA. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. And does the bill fix the height above water, or is it a draw-bridge?

Mr. REA. It is a draw-bridge, with power to change it at any time with the approval of the Secretary of War.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES CALER.

Mr. OVERTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 39, a bill (H. R. No. 6255) for the relief of James Caler, of Stamford, Connecticut; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the proper accounting officer of the Treasury of the United States to pay to James Caler, of Stamford, Connecticut, the sum of $4,845 for work done by him under a contract with the United States in the dredging and excavation of the bar at Rutherford Park in the Passaic River, New Jersey.

Mr. EDEN. I make the point of order on that bill.

Mr. OVERTON. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and that the bill and accompanying report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NEGOTIATION OF BILLS OF LADING, ETC.

Mr. BLISS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3255) to facilitate the negotiation of bills of lading and other commercial instruments, and to punish fraud therein; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REGISTRY OF STEAM-FERRYBOAT GENEVA.

Mr. BLISS also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1475) granting American registry to the Canadian steam-ferryboat Geneva.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to grant an American registry to the Canadian steam-ferryboat Geneva, now owned by B. W. Folger and M. H. Folger, citizens of the United States, and residing at Cape Vincent, New York, upon the payment into the United States Treasury of the duties legally chargeable upon said vessel.

Mr. CONGER. What is the tonnage of this vessel?

Mr. BLISS. The vessel is a very small one, and is only used for excursions and pleasure parties. I will state for the information of the gentleman from Michigan that this is regarded by the committee as an exceptional case, and the passage of the bill is unanimously recommended.

Mr. EDEN. Let it pass.

Mr. DUNNELL. It passed the House once before.

Mr. CONGER. Where is this ferry-boat used now?

Mr. BLISS. It is used between Cape Vincent, in the State of New York, and Kingston, in Canada West.

Mr. WARD. I ask that the report may be read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

Mr. CONGER. This being a small pleasure-boat, and one of the class which there is no danger in having registered as an American boat, I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLISS. I am sure there is no danger of that kind.

Mr. WARD. After the explanations which have been given, I withdraw the call for the reading of the report.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLISS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF STEAM-VESSELS.

Mr. BLISS also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 5897) to amend section 4400 of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning the regulation of steam-vessels.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to amend section 4400 of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the regulation of steam-vessels.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 4400 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended and enlarged by adding thereto, at the end of said section as it now appears, the words: "And all foreign private steam-vessels carrying passengers from any port of the United States to any other place or country shall be subject to the provisions of sections 4470, 4471, 4472, 4473, 4479, 4482, 4486, 4488, and 4489 of this title, and shall be liable to visitation and inspection by the proper officers in any of the ports of the United States respecting any of the provisions of the sections aforesaid."

Mr. EDEN. I would like to hear some explanation of that bill.

Mr. BLISS. The bill was introduced by my colleague, [Mr. COX,] and he can explain it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will not take more than a minute to explain it.

These sections referred to in the Revised Statutes, about seven of them, all have reference to provisions against fire, combustibles, and provisions for the preservation of life upon steamboats.

The idea is to place foreign vessels that come into our ports, in the same relation to commerce and the preservation of life as our own vessels are placed. The idea is to give additional safety and sanctity to human life.

I will say that in the steamboat bill passed by the House last session, and now in the Senate, there is a clause providing that all steam-vessels of other countries shall be subject to the same provisions as our own. I will read it:

SEC. 4400. All steam-vessels navigating any waters of the United States, excepting public vessels of the United States and of other countries, shall be subject to the provisions of this title. Steam-vessels of other countries, other than public vessels, shall be subject to the provisions of this title so far as relates to equipment, outfits, and navigating, and the transportation of dangerous articles as freight or stores.

This bill goes no further, indeed it hardly goes so far, as the measure that passed last session, and I therefore hope the bill will pass without further objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVIGABLE WATERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 6239) to declare and define the jurisdiction of the United States over the harbors and navigable waters of the United States as a substitute for House bills Nos. 2464 and 4953.

Mr. EAMES. I reserve the point of order upon that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island reserves all points of order upon the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to declare and define the jurisdiction of the United States over the harbors and navigable waters of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the Secretary of War is reliably informed, or has reason to believe, that in any harbor or navigable waters of the United States navigation is impeded, or shoals, bars, or other impediments to navigation have been created by reason of the improper extension of wharves, piers, and other structures into such harbors or navigable waters, under the authority of local laws, or by individuals without such authority, or by depositing ballast, slabs, or any other material, or that the future usefulness of such harbors or navigable waters is imperiled by such structures or deposits to the injury of commerce, he shall cause to be made, by the Corps of Engineers of the Army, full and complete survey and examination of such harbor or navigable waters, and plans and descriptions thereof, showing the depth of water in the same, and the location, size, and description of all piers, wharves, and other structures and obstructions or deposits therein, and the extent to which the same encroach upon the channels and water-ways used for navigation, and further to lay down and mark on such plans and descriptions lines which should limit the boundaries within which any wharf, pier, or other obstruction or deposits shall thereafter be erected, constructed, placed, or projected in any harbor or navigable waters. And such plans and descriptions shall be on a scale and of a kind, to be fixed by the Secretary of War, so that they may be easily understood and examined by all parties interested; and the Secretary of War shall be, and is hereby, authorized, upon the application of the governor of any State, or the municipal authority of any city, town, or county to which the harbor or navigable waters of any such plan and description pertain, to have the same lithographed, or otherwise copied, at the expense of said State or municipal authority, and to supply such number of copies thereof as they may require.

SEC. 2. If it shall be found by the officers making such surveys, examinations, plans, and descriptions that there are any existing wharves, piers, or other obstructions or deposits in any harbor or navigable waters, surveyed, examined, planned, and described by them, which are injurious to, and impede the navigation thereof, by being situate beyond the lines established by them, they shall so report to the Secretary of War, who shall report to Congress, to the end that proper steps may be taken by Congress for the removal of the same, and whether any compensation to the owners thereof should be made by the United States, if the same have been erected by State or municipal authority, or if not erected by such authority, then to take order for the removal thereof as nuisances by proper legal proceedings.

SEC. 3. That no bridge shall be built and extended across any navigable river until a plan in duplicate showing the location and situation thereof has been presented to the Secretary of War and approved by him, and that his approval, if given, shall be certified on one of said plans, and that the duplicate thereof shall be retained and preserved in the War Department: Provided, That this act shall not be construed so as to give authority to erect such bridge without an act of Congress.

SEC. 4. And whereas the harbors and navigable waters of the United States are frequently injured and obstructed, and the navigation thereof impeded, by wrecked and sunken vessels, and no competent or effective authority now exists for the removal of the same, it is further enacted that it shall be the duty of the collector of the customs at every port of the United States to cause proper reports to be made to him by some one of his inspectors of the wrecking or sinking of any vessel or the making deposits as aforesaid within the harbor or navigable waters of his district, and thereupon immediately to give notice in writing to the master or owner of such wrecked or sunken vessel to raise and remove the same within twenty days after such notice has been given, or to remove the deposits aforesaid. And if such owner or master neglects or refuses to raise and remove the same, or cannot be found, then the said collector shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter upon and seize such wrecked or sunken vessel, and proceed without delay to raise and remove the same, at the expense of the United States, and his vouchers therefor, when indorsed and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be refunded as hereinafter provided in this act, and thereupon to cause the remains of such wrecked or sunken vessel to be sold at public sale, giving twenty days' notice of such sale by advertisement in some newspaper of general circulation printed and published in his district, and also by notice posted on the remains of such wrecked or sunken vessel if it be practicable to do so, and pay the proceeds of such sale to the assistant treasurer of the United States in his district, for the use of the United States. And he shall thereupon report to the attorney of the United States for his district the cost of raising and removing said wrecked or sunken vessel, and the proceeds of the sale thereof, if any; and it shall be the duty of said district attorney, if said sunken vessel shall be insured, forthwith to bring suit against the master or owner of such wrecked or sunken vessel for the recovery of the balance due the United States, after deducting the net proceeds of such sale, for the cost and expense of such raising and removal; and a notice of such suit or proceeding, duly served under the direction of the court in which the suit shall be instituted, on the company or companies issuing such policy or policies of insurance on said vessel, shall give the United States a lien on so much of the insurance money as may be necessary to reimburse the United States for the balance due as aforesaid; and said attorney shall forthwith institute proceedings by attachment or otherwise, for the benefit of the United States, for collecting said insurance, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose aforesaid, which sum, when so collected, shall be paid into the Treasury as above provided.

SEC. 5. With a view to carrying out the provisions of this act, the Secretary of War is hereby required to include in the annual estimates to be submitted by him to Congress such sum as may, in his judgment, be necessary to enable him to comply therewith: Provided, That none of the surveys or examinations contemplated by this act shall be commenced until a special estimate shall have been submitted therefor by the officer detailed to make such examination or survey, and such estimate shall have been approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 6. It shall further be the duty of the Secretary of War, when he is reliably informed that in any harbor or navigable waters of the United States navigation is about to be impeded by the improper extension of wharves, piers, or other structures or deposits aforesaid, to give notice to the party or parties about to make such wharves, piers, or other structures or deposits, that he will order an immediate survey of such harbor; and when such notice has been given, it shall not be lawful for such party or parties to proceed in the erection of such wharves, piers, or other structures, or to make such deposits, until such survey has been made.

Mr. EDEN. I make the point of order upon that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] reserved all points of order.

Mr. EAMES. I want to reserve it until I hear what the object of the bill is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot reserve the point of order until the bill has been discussed.

Mr. EDEN. I make the point of order because this bill should be carefully discussed, and it cannot be done to-night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will indicate what his point of order is.

Mr. EDEN. It is that the bill appropriates money; line 20, page 4.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read Rule 112.

The Clerk read as follows:

All proceedings touching appropriations of money, and all bills making appropriations of money or property or requiring such appropriations to be made, shall have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That clause merely has in view the expenditure of public money, for it affirms the manner in which it shall be refunded. The Chair thinks that the fifth section comes within the rule.

Mr. SPARKS. Section 5 is certainly subject to the objection.

The SPEAKER. That section will be read.

The Clerk again read the fifth section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that is touching a matter which requires an appropriation to be made, and therefore he sustains the point of order, and rules that the bill must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to make a single statement with a view of asking that by unanimous consent some time shall be fixed for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. EDEN. I object.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make a remark preliminary to a motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill.

I desire to say that in the expenditure of money upon the improvement of rivers and harbors, it is absolutely necessary——

Mr. EDEN. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. EDEN. Then I object to debate.

Mr. CONGER. I ask permission to make a single statement.

Mr. EDEN. I object; and I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he will necessarily be absent from the House at the opening of to-morrow's session, and he has appointed Mr. SAYLER to take the chair at the opening.

The question was taken on Mr. EDEN's motion, and it was agreed to; and accordingly at (nine o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the order of the Senate of January 20, 1879, relative to the consideration of bills on the Calendar shall not be suspended unless by unanimous consent, or upon one day's notice.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think that had better lie over until the Senate is full. There are very few Senators in their seats now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think no Senator will object to the resolution. It is the construction that was given to the rule, drawn rather differently, at the last session. The rule is of no sort of use unless this is appended to it, because the consideration of the Calendar is constantly put aside for other business.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not understand the resolution, and I ask that it be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again reported.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It goes over on my objection. However, let it be reported.

The Secretary read the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia objects, and the resolution goes over for the day.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 29th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 1242) to repeal section 1233 of the Revised Statutes, relating to company cooks in the Army; and

An act (S. No. 1435) authorizing the appointment of Dr. Junius L. Powell an assistant surgeon in the United States Army.

COUNSEL FEES IN OSAGE LAND SUITS.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2153) providing for the payment of counsel fees in Osage ceded land suits.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out of the Indian civilization fund, from any of the funds arising from the sale of any of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas, the following sums, in full for all claims for counsel fees, to wit: to J. S. Black, $12,833.33; to McComas and McKeighan, $12,233.33; to William Lawrence, $12,633.33; to Wilson Shannon, his heirs or assigns, $10,383.33.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I know nothing of the merits of this bill, but the amount named, probably $50,000, seems to be a very large sum to be paid to four or five gentlemen as fees. I should like to know something about the bill before I am prepared to vote for it. I wish to know exactly what is meant by this payment.

Mr. PLUMB. This bill passed the House unanimously, after the consideration of the Indian Committee of that body. It also received the consideration of the similar committee on the part of the Senate. It simply recognizes the result of certain litigation which has taken place at the instance of certain settlers in the State of Kansas, whereby the Indian fund has derived a very large benefit as well as the Government itself, which litigation resulted in a determination adverse to the rights of certain railroad companies to certain lands in that State, whereby this benefit has been derived to the Government and to the Indians. It is a case of very strong equity, and I do not think there can be any possible objection to the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I still am not aware why these gentlemen should be paid $50,000 out of the Treasury of the United States for litigation in regard to certain lands which was had between the railroad companies and the Indians. I do not understand the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will excuse me, the money is not to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Out of what is it to be paid?

Mr. PLUMB. It is to be paid out of a certain Indian fund which derived benefit from this litigation, and not out of the Treasury at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Where is the fund?

Mr. PLUMB. The fund is in the Treasury, but it is in the Treasury for the benefit of the Indians themselves, as the result of the sale of their lands.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to inquire whether or not this bill comes from the Indian Committee? I have asked one member of that committee who sits near me, and he says he does not know anything about it.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state the exact condition of the bill so far as the Calendar is concerned. The House bill came here and went on the Calendar, but previously to that time a bill of precisely the same kind had been considered by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs favorably, and it had been reported back and was also on the Calendar. Of course whether this be the House bill or the Senate bill is of no consequence whatever, the subject-matter having been considered by the Indian Committee of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. There is a report from the House committee accompanying the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to know the facts before I am willing to vote for the bill. Money is to be taken from an Indian fund and paid to certain gentlemen, and it amounts probably to more than $50,000, as I heard the bill read. We ought to be careful how we take money from the Indians and give it to others as a fee. If it does not come directly from the Treasury now, it will in the future, in some way or other, be paid by the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state to the Senator very briefly what the facts of the case are. In 1866 a treaty was made between the United States and the Osage Indians, whereby these Indians ceded a certain body of land in the State of Kansas to the United States to be sold. That treaty recognized the right of certain settlers then on the lands to purchase them at a dollar and a quarter an acre. Subsequently, in 1869, Congress passed a joint resolution authorizing the sale of those lands to actual settlers at a dollar and a quarter an acre. Under the invitation of that joint resolution a very large number of people went on those lands, esteeming themselves entitled to go there because the joint resolution provided in substance and in terms that they should have the right to purchase the lands at a dollar and a quarter an acre. They went upon the lands.

About that time two railroad companies set up a claim to the land by reason of a grant of lands made to them long before that. Thereupon the case was brought before the Secretary of the Interior, who decided in favor of the railroad companies. Pending that decision, however, the settlers had purchased under the terms of the joint resolution of Congress land from the Government amounting to about $300,000, for which they had paid their money. When the decision of the Secretary of the Interior was promulgated of course it operated to cut them out, not only from their money, but from all rights by reason of the purchase, and it ousted them from their homes. They thereupon instituted litigation in the courts of Kansas. That went on for three or four years, and of course the result was adverse to the settlers as they found that they had no standing in court, because they had no title, the Government having by the action of its executive officers cut them out from that standing.

Then, on the application of Mr. Crozier, then Senator from the State of Kansas, the Attorney-General authorized a suit to be prosecuted for the purpose of determining what the rights of these people were, that is to say, between the Government on the one side and the railroad companies on the other, and authorized the intervention of the settlers by counsel for the purpose of determining the question. This litigation was carried on by the settlers by their counsel, and the result of it was that the circuit court first and the Supreme Court of the United States subsequently decided that the right was not in the railroad companies, but that the settlers under the joint resolution of 1869 had a right to purchase this land at a dollar and a quarter an acre.

Prior to that time, however, and in anticipation of the result to be derived from the joint resolution authorizing settlers to go upon the land, the Government had advanced to the Indian civilization fund the sum of $300,000, reserving to itself the right to be reimbursed from the sale of this particular tract of land. If the suit had been determined adversely to the settlers the Government would have had no fund from which to have been reimbursed this sum of $300,000, because the railroad companies would have taken it wholly under their grant. The result of the litigation was to reimburse to the Government $300,000 which before that time it had advanced to the Indian civilization fund, and gave to the Indian civilization fund in addition some six or seven hundred thousand dollars, which otherwise it would have been deprived of. This litigation was necessary because the Government first by its joint resolution had invited these people to go upon the land and in pursuance of the terms of the resolution had taken their money from them in payment for the land, and by a subsequent decision of the Secretary of the Interior it had sought to oust them, and did in fact oust them in favor of the railroad companies.

It is true that this is not a singular case, and that cases somewhat similar have been going on under the decisions of the General Land Office for years, whereby men have been ousted for the benefit of railroad companies from homesteads to which they had made claims and upon which they had made improvements. It is singular alone because it is a case of the largest magnitude of any similar case that has ever occurred under the construction of the land laws of the United States. That is the only singular thing about it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him a question? Did not the settlers employ these men and pay them their fees?

Mr. PLUMB. They employed them by the request or by the understanding of the Attorney-General of the United States. When he directed the district attorney for the district of Kansas to bring this suit, he specially required that officer to permit the settlers to appear by counsel, and they did so appear, and the litigation was practically carried on by them, not only in the circuit court of the United States, but in the Supreme Court of the United States, and they have not been paid by the settlers.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What is the meaning of the clause in the bill which provides that if they have been paid their fees they shall refund them? What is there for them to refund?

Mr. PLUMB. That is simply to cover that possibility, which of course is not covered by my statement here. I make a verbal statement here to the effect that they have not been paid, but that of course does not bind anybody except myself. The object is to fix the bill in such a way that if it should prove that they received anything thereby it shall be refunded. The fact is that they have not received anything, and consequently there is nothing to refund.

Mr. SAUNDERS. My understanding of this subject is that these attorneys were employed by the settlers and the settlers paid them, and afterward having gained the suit, they wished to take a larger fee probably, and to take it out of this Indian fund, and they returned the other fee. I do not know whether there is any justice in that. My understanding is, I will say to my friend from Kansas, that the Attorney-General has refused to acknowledge this claim in any way or to advise any one to favor the payment of this money. I understand that he has been called upon in regard to this subject, and has actually refused to take part in it. Therefore I think the bill should go over, at any rate for the present, until the matter can be further investigated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An objection does not carry the bill over. The question is, Are there amendments, as in Committee of the Whole, to the bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator from Kansas has finished, I wish to say a word. In the explanation the Senator has given I have not heard that the Indians have made the request that their money should be taken and paid to the counsel in this case. Certainly we ought to have their consent before their money is taken, if we are to take it at all. Again, I notice the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in his seat, and as yet he has not had a word to say. I presume that he knows something about this bill. It has been considered by his committee, and I should be glad to hear what he has to say about it.

Mr. PLUMB. So far as the matter concerning the consent of the Indians is concerned, when the Secretary of the Interior decided that not only the Indians themselves but the settlers had no right to these lands, I am not informed that he ever consulted the Indians about it at all. He simply decided that the railroad companies had a right to these lands, and thereby cut out both the Indians and the settlers. That would have been the time when, as I think, some philanthropic gentleman ought to have intervened in favor of the Indians and suggested that their consent should be obtained before that decision was ratified, taking away from them not only all this domain and this fund, but also the rights of the Government. The Indians ought to have been consulted, and perhaps the Government ought to have been consulted.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas a question. Are these attorneys' fees that are provided for in the bill the result of a contract between the Indians and the attorneys?

Mr. PLUMB. They are not the result of a contract between the Indians and the attorneys, because the Indians did not employ them and did not intervene in the litigation at all. They are the result of a contract between the settlers and these attorneys, and the Indians themselves were neither a party to the suit nor a party to the contract for the payment of the fees.

Mr. HEREFORD. Then I would ask the Senator from Kansas, if the fees fixed in the bill are not the result of a contract between the Indians and the attorneys, and if it be correct, as said by the Senator, that the Indians never did employ these attorneys, why take these fees out of moneys belonging to the Indians to pay the attorneys when the attorneys appeared for other parties?

Mr. PLUMB. For a very obvious reason: that if this litigation had not taken place the Indians themselves would not have derived this benefit. In other words, the Indians were not represented by anybody. The Indians had no chance of being represented by anybody. They were entirely silent in this matter; they had no chance to be represented; and, while it be true that the settlers undertook this litigation primarily for their own benefit, the result was much larger to the Indians beneficially than to anybody else except to the General Government.

Mr. HEREFORD. But have not the attorneys already been paid by the settlers?

Mr. PLUMB. They have not.

Mr. HEREFORD. Why not? Why have not the settlers paid the attorneys instead of asking that they be paid out of the Indian fund?

Mr. PLUMB. That is one of those questions the Senator can answer perhaps as well as I can. The fact is that the benefit of that litigation resulted to the Government and to the Indian fund, and not to the settlers themselves, who went into litigation simply for the purpose of maintaining their rights under the laws, of which they had been wrongfully deprived by a decision of the Interior Department and their lands given to the railroad companies. The court decided that they were entitled to those lands. Thereupon the Indian fund received nearly $900,000 as the result of that litigation. Of course the Indians were not in condition to consent, neither were they in a condition to object, simply because they were not parties to the suit and had no means of becoming parties to the suit. The result of the labor of these attorneys, under the operation of these settlers, (and this represents a very small proportion of the cost which these settlers undertook and which they have incurred in carrying on this litigation,) was to put into the civilization fund, as I said, about $900,000, of which $300,000 had been advanced by the Government, for which the Government could not have been reimbursed except for the result of this litigation.

Mr. HEREFORD. I am reliably informed that there was a written contract between some one or all of these attorneys with their clients, the settlers, giving these very attorneys a fee; and if they have a written contract and their clients are bound to pay these attorneys, why should the Indians be made to pay them?

Mr. PLUMB. The question whether there was a written contract or a verbal contract does not cut any figure in the case. One is just as binding as the other. There is no doubt in the world—of course it would be an insult to these gentlemen to suppose that they served without a contract with somebody. They would have had no status in court unless they had been employed. As I stated before, when the Attorney-General of the United States authorized the institution of the suit he especially required the district attorney for Kansas to permit the attorneys for the settlers to come in, and if these gentlemen had not been the attorneys of the settlers they could not have come in to represent the settlers or anybody else. There is no doubt of the fact that these parties did have a contract with the settlers for the payment of their fees; but as I said before, the fact back of this is that this suit became necessary because of the unjustifiable and arbitrary ruling of the Interior Department whereby these men were cut out of homes that they had paid for. They had paid into the Treasury of the United States nearly $300,000 under the terms of the joint resolution of 1869 authorizing them specifically to go on these lands and to acquire title by settlement and by payment. That money was in the Treasury. They were not only fighting for the money they had paid, but they were fighting for their homes which had been taken away from them, and which the Supreme Court of the United States said had been arbitrarily, unjustly, and illegally taken away from them. It became necessary for them in pursuance of that right which they held dear, which was all they could have in the world almost, to cause this suit to be instituted and carry it on; and it was ultimately determined by the Supreme Court of the United States that the action of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and of the Secretary of the Interior giving these lands to the railroad companies and taking them away from the settlers was illegal, was arbitrary, was unjust, and therefore they were enabled to go on and obtain title to this land. As the result of this litigation, the Indian civilization fund was enabled to reimburse the General Government $300,000 which before that time had been advanced by the General Government, and besides was supplied with $600,000 more, which the settlers paid in for lands acquired subsequently to the termination of the litigation.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Kansas whether these settlers were not reimbursed by the Government of the United States by giving them other lands in lieu of those that they were called on to surrender?

Mr. PLUMB. The settlers have been reimbursed in no way. All the privilege they obtained by reason of this litigation was the same privilege they had under the joint resolution of 1869, of buying these lands at one dollar and a quarter an acre. In other words, the result of the litigation simply restored the original status so far as they were concerned.

Mr. MERRIMON. But why should these large fees be paid out of the Indian fund?

Mr. PLUMB. Because the Indian fund itself was primarily interested in the decision of this suit and derived the largest benefit from it. In the first place, I think the entire benefit derived by the decision in this suit in favor of the settlers gave to the Indian fund about $900,000 in cash. If the land had gone under the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, unappealed from, to the railroad companies, of course the Indians would not have got one single dollar; the railroad companies would have had the land, the settlers would have been minus their homes, and the Indian fund would have been minus $900,000, which, since that time, the settlers have paid into it under the joint resolution of 1869 and the subsequent legislation.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I think the facts of the case are all in a nutshell. A joint resolution authorized the sale of these Indian lands. Certain settlers purchased under that sale. Some railroad companies undertook to take the whole lands, claiming them under a grant. A suit arose between the settlers who had purchased a portion of them and the railroad companies. The result of that suit was in favor of the settlers, but it decided the question also as to the whole of the lands claimed by the railroad companies. The whole of the proceeds of the lands went to the Indian trust fund. The suit under which these counsel fees are claimed was between the settlers and the railroad companies, as I understand.

Mr. PADDOCK. May I inquire of the Senator what effect an adverse decision to the rights of the settlers would have had upon the Indians?

Mr. DAWES. If the decision had been the other way, of course it would have settled questions of law that would have determined the title to all the lands. In other words, the railroad companies under that decision would show that they had a right not only to the lands contested in this suit but to all the other lands; and in that sense it is that the Indian trust fund was benefited indirectly by this suit between the settlers and the railroad companies. Now, the settlers employed these counsel and agreed to pay them a contingent fee, as I understand.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is, the Indians would not have received the proceeds of the sales?

Mr. DAWES. The Indians would not have received the proceeds of this sale. The Indians never had anything to do with this suit. But when the railroad companies came to claim the lands that were still a part of the Indian Territory, the law decided in this suit would probably have settled that case.

Now, this was a contingent fee going to these attorneys from the settlers. The settlers think that the Indians ought to pay their counsel and so they be relieved from paying their own counsel. That is the way it strikes me. They say that the Indians have had decided for them in this suit a question which otherwise they would have had to have litigation about. Now they seem to think that it is right that the Indians should pay their counsel who were employed in the suit between them and the railroad companies. In settling the question between them and the railroad companies they prevailed on a contingent fee. They think that because the Indians indirectly have had the benefit of that discussion of law and judgment of the court the Indians ought to pay their counsel fees. That is the way I understand it.

When a man makes a contract with an attorney to attend to a litigation between him and a third party the question is whether it is proper, because another man's case is indirectly decided in that suit, for this man in this suit to shift his attorney's fees off on to the other man and say, "the other man is profited a great deal more in consequence of this suit which I have carried on by my attorney, and therefore he should pay his fees." That is the way it strikes me. I may be wrong about it.

Mr. PLUMB. There is one very material difference, I think, between the facts of the case and those stated by the Senator from Massachusetts in this: He says that the settlers were a party to this suit. That is not the case. The suit was on the part of the United States against the railroad companies, but these counsel representing the settlers were authorized to and did appear and did make up the case, and did try the case in favor of the United States against the railroad companies. The settlers had no standing in court, as of course they could not have any. The Secretary of the Interior had not only decided against them, but he had decided in favor of the railroad companies, and had proceeded to patent every single acre of the land to the railroad companies, and of course the settlers could not have any standing in court because they had no paper title, no title of any kind whatever. They were under the law naked trespassers upon these lands which they had been invited to go upon by the joint resolution of 1869, and for which they had under that same invitation paid their money into the Treasury of the United States; and therefore they were not only contending for the rights of the Government, but for their own rights guaranteed to them as they conceived by Congress. They were not parties to the suit; they employed counsel in behalf of the United States; and while the result of that litigation was to give them the title to their land, it gave to the Government itself the money which it had advanced to the Indian civilization fund, and gave to the Indian civilization fund a very large sum of money besides. They were not carrying on alone their own litigation; they were carrying on their own litigation, and also the litigation of the Government and the Indians. They were carrying on the litigation of the Indians and the Government, and the Indians received more benefit from it than the settlers did. More than that, these men were contending for rights under a law of Congress, and it does not lie in the mouth of Congress now to say that because these men relied on the faith of that legislation, therefore they should be cut out of their rights to these lands and cut out of the money they had paid for them. Is it to be held that they have no right to come in and ask Congress to restore them that which they were justly entitled to?

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, it may not lie in the mouth of the United States to say that they will not pay the counsel employed by the settlers, but that is no answer to the question whether we shall make the Indian pay them or not. It may be very proper that the United States should pay these fees; and on that point I do not express an opinion, for I do not know the relation between these settlers and their rights and the United States. Why there was an intervening of other counsel in a suit represented by the district attorney of the United States, I do not understand. I do not care to inquire about that; but I do not see that it follows that this expense should be visited upon the Indian fund. This is a fund that belongs to the Indians, and I do not know why, when the United States may be obligated to pay these counsel, they should turn over and charge it upon some trust fund which they hold for the Indians. The Indians were entitled to this fund. If a set of railroad men were after the fund and the United States had sold the settlers this property, it was the duty of the United States to intervene between the railroad companies and the settlers and to vindicate the right of the settlers under the resolution of Congress. That was their business as much as it is my business when I give a deed to my neighbor to intervene and defend the title which I give him; but that I should be permitted to charge over my counsel fees under those circumstances to somebody else, to a fund I am holding in trust because indirectly it may appear that in deciding this suit it was my duty to litigate I also saved myself the trouble of deciding it in another suit in which the Indians are a party. I do not criticise the charge of the counsel nor the propriety of the United States paying it; that may be so or it may not be so. I desire to inquire in all good faith why any doubtful question should be settled in this short way by charging it over to some trust fund that has no representative to resist it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I was not aware that this bill was coming up this morning, nor had I heard it read, nor was I aware of the exact character of the bill. Now I desire to make an inquiry. Do I understand that the bill as it stands appears as reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does not. It has never been referred. It was read the first and second time, and placed on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I see from the bill as read at the Clerk's desk that it is proposed to pay this money out of the Indian trust fund. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that to pay this money out of the Indian trust fund would be an act of injustice to them. They were in no sense parties to this litigation. As I understand, (and I am speaking now from memory, because this matter was before the Indian Committee more than a year ago and some of the facts may have escaped my mind,) the Indians were in no sense interested in the result of this litigation. The Government of the United States undertook to remove the Osages from their reservation in Kansas to the Indian Territory, and advanced, as I remember, a sum out of the Treasury, amounting to about $300,000, for the purpose of securing this removal and fixing them in their new home. The Indians were removed. The United States was to be reimbursed by the sale of their reservation in Kansas, and the remainder of the fund, whatever it was, was to go into the Treasury, and bear an interest of 5 per cent. for the benefit of this civilization fund so called.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me to inquire of him if the Indians have asked that this be paid out of their money?

Mr. ALLISON. I should think not. There was a contest going on in the State of Kansas for some years as to how these lands should be sold. They were sold I believe at one time at the rate of twenty-five cents an acre or perhaps eighteen cents an acre. That sale was set aside. After that a resolution of some character passed Congress authorizing the sale of these lands at $1.25 per acre. They might be sold at that rate to a single person or to a number of persons. In the mean time a large number of settlers entered upon these lands, the Senator from Kansas says by authority of law under a joint resolution of 1869. If such a resolution was passed, I think it will be found that it was inadvertently passed. I have not that resolution before me. I trust it will be read as I do not remember its exact provisions. But in the mean time the Department of the Interior, as I remember, sold these lands in a body to one or two railroad companies at $1.25 per acre and patents were issued to the railroad companies. Meanwhile settlers were flocking upon these lands and taking them up. They were valuable lands, worth more than a dollar and a quarter per acre, and the contest then rested between these settlers, who it was claimed by the railroad companies had entered on these lands without authority of law, and the railroad companies, who pretended to be the actual purchasers of the lands. These suits were instituted by authority of Congress in the district court of the United States for Kansas, by direction of the Attorney-General, the district attorney appearing in the cases. The attorneys for the settlers intervened and became parties to the suit in some way. The suit was finally carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. There was a long litigation and a difficult litigation, and the result was that the settlers triumphed over the railway companies; and the question now before us is whether the settlers shall be compelled to pay these fees themselves, whether the United States shall pay these fees, or whether the Indians shall have these fees paid out of their trust fund?

Whatever else may be done, I do not believe Congress can afford to say that this money shall be taken out of the trust fund of the Osage Indians. I have no objection to the payment of reasonable and proper fees, if they are to be paid, out of some proper fund; I do not know but that these fees are proper and legitimate and not exorbitant. If they are to be paid, though, they should be paid by the Treasury of the United States, or else out of the fund raised by these settlers, and not out of this trust fund.

And while I am up, as I see the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] in my eye listening to what I say, I remember that only two or three days ago he introduced a bill, and referred it to the Committee on Indian Affairs, asking that the Osage Indians be reimbursed for the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of land on this identical reservation, which by a joint resolution passed in 1870 or 1871 the Congress of the United States undertook to donate to the State of Kansas, and which Congress had no more right to donate, in my judgment, than they have to donate your private possessions or mine.

Now, at this distance of time, after the State of Kansas has taken the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections from the Osage reservation, we are called upon, and, so far as I have been able to examine the case, justly, to refund to these Indians the price of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections. Now, it is proposed to deplete this Indian fund still further by the payment of what may be proper and legitimate attorneys' fees out of that fund which is in no sense interested, as I understand the case, in its payment.

I did not understand until this bill was read at the Clerk's desk that it was proposed to use the Indian fund for the purpose of paying these attorneys' fees. I do not think that it ought to be done under any circumstances.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar at the point where it was left off under the call of yesterday.

JOHN C. BIRDSELL.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire the attention of the Senate for a moment, and in doing so I am satisfied I am taking a course which will expedite business. I move to postpone the Calendar and all prior orders and take up the bill (S. No. 501) for the relief of John C. Birdsell, and on that I desire to be heard a moment.

Senators of course desire to vote on the actual state of facts presented by a bill. It is very easy to create a prejudice by saying that a bill belongs to a certain class of legislation, as that it proposes to extend a patent. This bill proposes to do nothing of that kind, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the exact nature of the bill that I desire taken up.

The bill provides that the Commissioner of Patents shall have power to consider an application for the extension of a patent in all respects similar to the power he exercises under the act of July, 1870. That act provides for a publication of notice of the application for sixty days, also for a thorough investigation as to the novelty and originality of the invention, for the regular examination and cross-examination of witnesses in favor of and in opposition to the application, and for a full hearing as to the novelty and utility of the invention and the propriety of the extension in respect to the public interest, and whether or not the inventor, after having used proper diligence, has been sufficiently remunerated. Now, on behalf of a worthy and most respectable citizen of Indiana, against whose application there comes not one single remonstrance from his own State, I humbly request the Senate to consider this bill in its regular order on the Calendar.

Mr. MERRIMON. What is the invention?

Mr. VOORHEES. It is an invention for the purpose of thrashing and cleaning clover-seed. It has been postponed, under the rule under which we are operating, by a single objection heretofore. It has been passed over on the Calendar. My object this morning is simply to have it considered, and if the sense of the Senate is against allowing this gentleman to apply to the Commissioner for an extension let it be so recorded, but do not treat him as if he was asking legislation that was not worthy of our consideration.

I am enforced in my application to the Senate by the fact that the Committee on Patents has made a report granting his request, made a report in favor of this bill, and there is no minority report coming from that committee against it. I will read the report of the Committee on Patents, a committee as highly honored in its ability and integrity as any other committee of this body; a committee composed of gentlemen of the highest standing, character, and talents. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was instructed by that committee to present the following report, which I will read:

> The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 501) for the relief of John C. Birdsell, have considered the same, and heard evidence in support thereof, and report that the same ought to pass.
> They find the following facts established by the evidence:
>
> First. The invention is one of great public utility. It has cheapened the cost of clover-seed from one to two dollars a bushel, and thereby greatly increased the use of a most valuable method of fertilizing.
> Second. The inventor has failed to receive any considerable reward for his invention.

These are not my words; they are the words of a committee of this body charged with the investigation of this subject, and speaking from the facts submitted to them.

> He has been compelled—

Continue the committee—

> during nearly the whole life of his patent to contend with a powerful and wealthy combination, over whom his final victory was achieved by the judgment in his favor of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered in April, 1874. He has also sustained very heavy losses by fire.
>
> Third. The extension of the patent will not, to any great degree, and probably not at all, operate as a tax upon the public. The machine patented is complicated and costly, requiring for its construction expensive works and machinery. It will be afforded to the public more perfectly and as cheaply by the petitioner if, in the necessary expenditure for its construction, he can be secure of the exclusive right to the manufacture.
> The bill authorizes the Commissioner to extend the patent only in case he shall find, on hearing, that the said Birdsell, without fault or neglect on his part, has failed to obtain from the use or sale of his invention or discovery a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon it and the introduction of it into use, and that it is just and proper, having due regard to the public interests, that the term of the patent should be extended.

The Committee on Patents report that for these reasons this gentleman ought to have a chance under the law to apply for an extension of that patent for his valuable invention. That application is to be published sixty days. Notice is to be publicly given to all the world when it will be heard in the Patent Office. Every opponent of the extension will have an opportunity to appear, be heard, cross-examine the witnesses of Mr. Birdsell, and introduce witnesses on his own behalf under oath. Is it to be said that a respectable American citizen shall not have a hearing when he asks simply for the privilege of submitting the merits of his case to the Commissioner of Patents? Shall he be denied a hearing? Will the Senate say that a man shall not have his claim for relief considered? The Senate may vote it down; but I apprehend the Senate is not going to say day after day that a modest request like this, coming from the respectable source that it does, upon a question so important to the public interests, shall not be considered.

I am not pleading the merits of the question. I am not standing before the Commissioner of Patents asking that this patent shall be extended. I am asking the American Senate to consider a bill introduced into this body and reported favorably by one of its most important committees. If you say it will lead to debate, let it lead to debate. It is the business of the Senate to consider this bill reported by one of its own committees. Are Senators afraid that they will not vote right, and therefore say they will not consider it at all? I am not in the habit of meeting questions in that way. All I ask is that this bill, placed on the Calendar by the Committee on Patents, without any minority report, shall be considered if it is worthy of consideration. I say if it is not worthy of consideration, if this gentleman cannot have his business done on the Calendar, I know of no other bill that has higher claim, and we may as well pause in attempting to proceed under the rule for unanimous consent to take up cases on the Calendar.

One word further. Sir, I might well pause on the point of the right of this gentleman to have his business considered, but I will say further that he himself is modest, he himself demands no extension of the patent from Congress; he simply asks the right to go and try the question before the Commissioner of Patents, and that alone, with sixty days' notice, and with all the world—everybody—having the same chance as himself to give evidence. That is all that is asked; and are you afraid to trust the Commissioner of Patents? I know General Paine, the present Commissioner of Patents. I served with him in the House. I esteem him to be an honest man and know him to be an intelligent one. Whether he is in the majority or the minority, I believe in his honest judgment, and I ask that he may have a chance to consider the question whether this patent should be extended.

The law in regard to the extension of patents is very clear. The Commissioner has to investigate all these allegations and charges. Will gentlemen maintain that we can sit here and report and try these facts better than the Commissioner can under the provisions of the law? I am not going into the merits of the claim now. I am not asking the Senate to consider them, nor does the bill ask the Senate to consider them. If Senators are opposed to allowing any one to go and ask for a renewal of his patent, that is another thing. I do not think any one is desirous to do that.

I expected this measure to be presented by my colleague, [Mr. MCDONALD,] who is now absent in the South on an investigating committee. He has more thoroughly investigated it than I have, and taking a deep and profound interest in it, I regret his absence on this occasion extremely. But if we are going to do the business on the Calendar reported by the committees of the Senate, I ask in fair play and in the spirit of simple justice that this gentleman shall have his business considered in its proper order.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I think my honorable friend has made quite a speech on asking to have this bill taken up out of order. I am not going to argue the merits of it now, but being one of the committee who did not concur in the report, I wish to say a word.

Mr. VOORHEES. I beg the Senator's pardon. I ask him whether he made any minority report?

Mr. KERNAN. I did not. The majority report is very short.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is very good, and I have read it.

Mr. KERNAN. I have read it and have it on my table. The question here is, whether this case in preference to all others on the Calendar shall be taken up out of its order.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is not the question.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to state my ground. We are proceeding to consider unobjected cases. We are not calling the Calendar when the bills that I want to move can be moved, if anybody suggests that they will take time, that they will have to be discussed, that there is difference of opinion about them. It is asked to be taken up out of the regular order, I repeat.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator will pardon me for saying that it has been passed over twice already.

Mr. KERNAN. It has been passed over under a call for unobjected cases, not otherwise. We have not yet got to the Calendar where a man can say, "I insist on my right to have a case called on the Calendar when it is reached." We are proceeding under a call to take up those cases that there is substantially no objection to and no discussion to be had about. The Senator considers this one of them, although it was said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] and others that this is one that they desire and intend to discuss.

There is an appeal made to Senators over this as if it were an unusual bill for the purpose in view. Why, sir, the committee do not report any bill to extend a patent by statute. All that is asked in any case is that we give the parties a chance by special law to go again before the Commissioner. This patent was granted in 1858. The patentee has had one renewal, which is not quite out yet. He has enjoyed his patent twenty-one years, and we are asked to pass a bill (which we sometimes report) that he be allowed to go to the Patent Office and see if they will again permit an extension of his patent. I think I may say that no bill goes through here to authorize an extension of a patent by the Commissioner on the theory that that is the place to try the question. It appeared before the committee that this gentleman has a chance to try it now in a pending suit, where they are taking evidence, where they say that he was not the original inventor, where they say that evidence that he was not the original inventor has been discovered since. I know nothing about it except what I heard in argument before the committee. We cannot investigate all that here; I am not going to discuss the merits. I am simply saying that this is a case that the man has a right to have heard; but I do not think he has a right over plenty of other men on this Calendar who will be heard before him if we go through the regular call of the Calendar, and we were proceeding to hear those cases where there was no difference of opinion substantially, where there was no real objection, where all that was necessary was to have the bill explained to the end that those might not wait until a regular call of the Calendar, where each man is heard on a litigated case according to its order on the Calendar.

Now, sir, I will not say a word about the merits of this bill. I merely say this much because it is suggested that there is something extraordinary in the view that this bill cannot be taken up as an unobjected case. If it is taken up, it is taken up as the rest where Senators from other States than New York have said they have had many petitions and they desire to be heard in opposition, and I yesterday indicated that there were things in the face of the applicant's petition that would lead every Senator to want to examine and hear, before we come to a conclusion. Our committee has reported exceptional cases where a man had not had twenty-one years' enjoyment of his patent; and it is for the Senate to decide whether there is anything in this case that should take it out of its regular order and bring it up now. I am not one of those who have made objection; I am merely saying that it is a case which will have to be discussed, and it seems to me it ought to be discussed before Senators vote upon it. If the Senate chooses to take it up now, very well. I am not struggling to prevent its having a hearing; but I want to say, that it is no argument that there is to be a trial in the Patent Office when many of the controversies that come before the Patent Committee arise out of the very sort of trials that are sometimes had there, by people not getting notice, or by a decision being made by one man in reference to matters that are strongly litigated which is not satisfactory.

Mr. VOORHEES. In response to the argument of the Senator from New York as to this being taken up out of order, it is well known on the floor of the Senate and is within the personal recollection of Senators that for weeks and I might say months of the last session this bill was put over and postponed by exactly the tactics pursued by the Senator from New York, by objections whenever it was called from day to day and week to week, until this gentleman went home denied the privilege of having his business considered, and it has now been twice treated in the same way during the present session.

All I have to say is that when this bill is reached, I hold that this gentleman has as much right to the time and consideration of this body as any other American citizen, and it is really just that his case shall be considered now.

Mr. KERNAN. I agree to that, but during the last session I stood here for constituents of mine where all the committee united in the report, and yet I could not get the case heard because some one thought it would take time and therefore it has to await the regular call of the Calendar where an objection does not send it over.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not object.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not say the Senator did, and he very rarely objects; but it is perfectly fair for a gentleman to object and say "this takes time."

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask, Mr. President, what effect the adoption of the motion of the Senator from Indiana to postpone the present and all prior orders and take up this patent bill will have upon the unfinished business of yesterday?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To throw it aside so that it will lose its place.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I hope the Senator from Indiana will not insist on that.

Mr. VOORHEES. When this case is disposed of the unfinished business can go on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir. Then when the unfinished business has gone by we shall have another struggle to get it up again.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope my distinguished friend from Vermont will not find that this poor little bill antagonizes his great and stupendous resolutions. I think it has opposition enough without that. I do not want to antagonize the Senator from Vermont at all, and I hope that it may not be found that this motion of mine does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is to be the effect of it, and it is now only ten minutes to half past one.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me modify my motion then to lay aside informally the unfinished business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The resolutions that I have offered have been a long time before the Senate, and they may as well be disposed of one way or the other to-day, and I say this in no hostility to the bill the Senator is speaking of, because my present inclination is, from what I have heard said about it, to favor the bill. I may not do so when I hear it further discussed; but that is my present impression. It was expected that we should have disposed of these resolutions yesterday, but the intervention of other business and an executive session threw them over; and I desire very much that at half past one we shall proceed with them and finish them. Then we shall be able to dispose of the other business afterward.

Mr. THURMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to move to postpone, or to lay aside the unfinished business informally?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He moves to postpone the pending and all prior orders, which motion prevailing will dispose of the unfinished business.

Mr. VOORHEES. I modify it.

Mr. THURMAN. I understood the Senator to move to lay aside the unfinished business informally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can move to postpone the pending order, which will not affect the unfinished business that will be reached in five minutes more.

Mr. THURMAN. I understood the Senator to withdraw that motion and ask to lay aside the unfinished business informally. Can he do that before we reach the unfinished business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He cannot.

Mr. JOHNSTON. My colleague [Mr. WITHERS] takes great interest in the bill which the Senator from Indiana desires to get up. He was here yesterday, but was called away, and will not be here to-day. I know he desires to discuss the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, inasmuch as I can only have five minutes if we get the consideration of this bill up until it will antagonize the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont, I will, with the understanding that I shall renew this motion whenever we reach the Calendar to-morrow, withdraw the motion for the present. I do not wish to antagonize the Senator from Vermont, and it will not be profitable to do so inasmuch as there are but five minutes remaining in which we could act on the bill to-day.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There will be opposition to-morrow.

Mr. VOORHEES. I know. I expect to have opposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn for to-day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Caleb be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

RICHMOND FEMALE INSTITUTE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The call of the Calendar will be now resumed at the point where it was left off yesterday. The first bill in order is the bill (S. No. 61) for the relief of the Richmond Female Institute, of Richmond, Virginia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I think needs a little looking into, certainly on the subject of damages and the period of time that is covered from October, 1865, to April, 1866, according to the report. Therefore I must ask that the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is objected to.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont, considering the fact that this is a unanimous report of the committee and that a great portion of the time which was expended in the debate the other day will be lost, two long reports having been read then, whether he will not allow the bill to be disposed of? I think the Senator from Vermont will be of opinion, when the facts are stated to him, that it is a claim beyond any possible question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will withdraw my objection long enough to hear the case stated by the honorable Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I am not aware that anybody has declined to pay rent for buildings occupied by our Army after the close of the war or even during the war when there was an actual contract to pay rent by an authorized officer. This Richmond Female Institute was taken possession of earlier than October, in the year 1865. A board of officers sat upon it and determined what a proper rental was, which rental was actually paid down to October, 1865; and the building was used from that time until a period in 1867, partly for the headquarters of the Army in Richmond and partly for the Freedmen's Bureau, the same building serving the purposes of both for a period of some twelve or fourteen months; the report states the dates. It was a time when there was not anywhere in the United States any property captured for military purposes. A considerable portion of the time was after the period in 1866 when the war was deemed closed by the proclamation of the President, and it comes within the principle because, although there was not a formal promise by a quartermaster to pay a particular sum for rent, there was, what was much stronger, an actual sitting by a board appointed for the purpose and the rent actually paid down to October, and this is merely for the continuance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But was it not held by the Department afterwards that this payment that had been made was illegal?

Mr. HOAR. It was on the technical ground that the statute had prohibited the payment of rent in the insurrectionary States by the Department. It is a case where, although there was not a technical promise to pay rent, there was the convening of a board of Army officers and the fixing of the rent, and an actual payment down to October, 1865. The premises were used partly for the Freedmen's Bureau and partly for the headquarters of the army at Richmond, a great portion of the time being after the close of the war, in 1866, and the rest being at a time when nowhere in the country were we exercising the hostile right of capture of real property for Army occupation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired. The Senate proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business, being the resolutions introduced by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. BURNSIDE. By the kindness of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] I ask one moment's time to consider the amendment I have offered to Senate bill No. 1491, to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States, and to make rules for its government and regulation. I wish the bill taken up with a view to adopting this amendment I have submitted, and then allowing further action to be passed over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot yield for the adoption of any amendment. If the Senator merely wishes to make a motion to refer, or something of that kind, I have no objection.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I beg to say that the amendment does not involve any change in the bill at all. It is simply an amendment striking out a portion of the bill, which latter portion has been introduced as a separate bill and referred to the Military Committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would give me great pleasure to agree to all this, but I objected to my friend from Indiana bringing up his little bill for his constituent, and have stopped the Richmond Female Institute, to go on with my resolutions. I am afraid the Senate will get quite as sick of me as they are of the resolutions if I do not have them disposed of now. I hope the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I must say that I made this motion because I thought it was the understanding.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I misunderstood the Senator. I thought he merely wished to make a formal motion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. So I understand that it is a formal motion. It is simply the division of a bill. It asks to do nothing or take nothing from it. However, I beg pardon of the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I misunderstood what the Senator meant to ask.

THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH, AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS on the 7th instant:

Resolved, as the judgment of the Senate, That the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States have been legally ratified, and are as valid and of the same paramount authority as any other part of the Constitution; that the people of each State have a common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State in the Union, and that it is alike the right and duty of Congress to enforce said amendments, and to protect every citizen in the exercise of all the rights thereby secured by laws of the general character already passed for that purpose, and by further appropriate legislation, so far as such enforcement and protection are not secured by existing laws; and that it is the duty of the executive department of the Government faithfully and with diligence to carry all such laws into impartial execution, and of Congress to appropriate all moneys needful to that end.

Resolved, further, That it is the duty of Congress to provide by law for the full and impartial protection of all citizens of the United States, legally qualified, in the right to vote for Representatives in Congress, and to this end the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, instructed to prepare and report, as soon as may be, a bill for the protection of such rights, and the punishment of infractions thereof.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have no proposition pending before the Senate, nor have I taken the floor on the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont. When the Senator from Vermont, with the consent of several gentlemen on our side, expressed a wish to get up his resolutions, and got them up for consideration after several efforts to do so, it being late in the afternoon after a fatiguing session, I arose and moved that the Senate adjourn. I took the floor for the purpose of moving that the Senate adjourn. The motion was carried, and of course my right to the floor there ended. The Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor if he chooses to occupy it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not want to occupy anything. I merely want a vote on the resolutions, if that is all we have to do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, will the Senate agree to the resolutions proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to understand whether the resolutions which were read to the Senate some days since as coming from the Senator from Alabama are pending as an amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. He has not offered them.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not offered them, but I propose to offer them now and speak upon them, having ascertained distinctly that the Senator from Vermont does not intend to discuss his own resolutions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has made a mistake in that.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I will yield to the Senator from Vermont, so that he may discuss his resolutions, and will offer mine as an amendment in order that he may have the opportunity of discussing both propositions in connection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, Mr. President, the Senator greatly misunderstands me. I do not wish to take any time, as the case now stands, to advance the propositions contained in the resolutions I had the honor to offer. I think they are strong enough to go alone. If the Senator offers any amendment, or opposes the resolutions with his usual skill and ability, very likely it may be necessary in order to preserve the even temper of the Senate that something should be said.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Vermont has been very happy in his efforts to preserve the even temper of the Senate. He came in on the 8th day of January, a sort of national celebration day, in a rather festive spirit, and presented these terms of peace, these emblems of reconciliation, peace in the North and reconciliation in the West, with an expression that they would be very happy in their effects if they were adopted unanimously. Otherwise I suppose the Senator might have expected they would be very unhappy. But the Senator from Vermont has, as I understand him, persistently declined to explain his resolutions to the Senate of the United States, and now stands upon the proposition that they are simply axiomatic and need no explanation; that they are in themselves a sufficient recommendation to the intelligence of the Senate and to the acceptance of the Senate without a word being said on his behalf in their support. He stands upon that ground, and I therefore feel authorized at this stage of the case, after the Senator from Vermont has three or four times made ineffectual efforts to bring these resolutions to the attention of the Senate during a period of now more than twenty-two days, and after he has been unable to obtain the consent of the Senate until those on our side assisted him in getting these resolutions to the attention of the Senate—I feel authorized to proceed to object to them upon the hypothesis that he considers them, as I have observed, entirely axiomatic, needing no explanation or support on his side, and that the whole burden of objection to them rests upon those who think the resolutions are not tenable and not proper to be considered at this moment of time.

The first extraordinary point in reference to these resolutions, Mr. President, is the time at which they have been offered.

Does the Chair understand that I have offered my substitute?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not, as yet.

Mr. MORGAN. I have so offered it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the amendment proposed by the Senator read before he commences his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

Mr. MORGAN. It is offered as a substitute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir, to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert, I suppose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

1. ———, as the judgment of the Senate, That the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States are as valid and binding as any other part of the Constitution; that the people of the United States have a common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State and in the Territories of the United States; and that it is alike the right and duty of the United States, so far as the power has been delegated to them, to enforce said amendments and to protect every citizen in the exercise of all the rights thereby secured.

2. Resolved, That the Government of the United States and the governments of the several States are distinct, and each has citizens of its own, who owe it allegiance, and whose rights within its jurisdiction it must protect; that the Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone; its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution; all powers not granted to it by that instrument, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people; and that no right can be acquired under the Constitution, or secured through the laws of the United States, except such as the Government of the United States has the authority to grant or secure.

3. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States; but the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and it is within the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, which Congress may exert by appropriate legislation, to prevent the denial or abridgment, by a State, of the right of a citizen to vote, when such denial or abridgment is on account of the race or color or previous condition of servitude of the voter.

4. Resolved, That when such right to vote is denied or abridged by the conduct of a person who is not so acting by the authority and in obedience to the laws of a State, the jurisdiction to punish such conduct is in the State government, and is not in the Government of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the most remarkable thing about these resolutions is the time of their introduction. The first proposition in the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont is:

That the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States have been legally ratified and are as valid and of the same paramount authority as any other part of the Constitution.

The thirteenth amendment to the Constitution was promulgated in pursuance of law on the 18th of December, 1865. The fourteenth amendment was promulgated on the 24th of July, 1868. The fifteenth amendment was promulgated on the 20th of March, 1870. Many Senators have come into the Senate of the United States from various parts of the Union between those periods and the present day. They have all been brought before the Senate, and they have taken upon themselves an oath to support the Constitution, and no Senator has been sworn here who has not perfectly understood that his oath of office included the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. Whether he may have come from the South, the East, the West, or the North, every Senator has felt that the obligation imposed upon him to support the Constitution of the United States without mental reservation was an obligation that included the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, and no Senator on either side of this Chamber, so far as I have observed, has by any vote or motion or speech or the expression of any sentiment indicated that he did not consider himself under the full obligation of that oath to support these amendments as he did all the rest of the Constitution of this country.

In view of these solemn asseverations on the part of Senators which if men have consciences left bear upon those consciences so as to constrain them to an honest compliance with the obligations they have taken, the Senator from Vermont, it seems, has never considered it necessary until the 8th day of January instant to put the question before the Senate and before the country whether these three amendments are of full force and obligation upon the country and upon the Senate. He seems to think that some new affirmation is needed; he seems to suppose that there will be some reluctance on our part in taking upon ourselves by voting for his resolutions these new affirmations he now requires us to make of the same things to which we have committed ourselves by solemn oaths in the presence of Almighty God. He seems to think, following up the notion which pervaded this country some time past, that it is necessary in order to compel a man to observe an oath that he must give security to keep the oath. There was a time which I well remember, and which I dare say is well remembered by many Senators here, when oaths were prescribed to citizens of the United States having reference to loyalty, and bond and security was required that the man who swore would keep his oath. Now it seems that at this late day the same spirit has found its lodgment in the bosom of the Senator from Vermont which was brought into existence and fostered by the acrimony and bitterness of the great struggle of hostilities between the contending sections and that the Senator wants us now to pledge by a resolution that we will observe and support our oaths solemnly taken with reference to the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

If he feels himself weakening on this subject, if he feels that he is not bound to support the Constitution of the United States until he has repeated that obligation in the form of a solemn resolution, I must say to him that there are few Senators I think on this floor who sympathize with him in that line of thought or in tolerating such a doubt of their own fidelity, and they would rather be left to the influence that the obligation itself has on their consciences sanctioned as it is by an appeal to God than to endeavor to strengthen the obligation by a mere political and partisan resolution introduced here for the purpose of vamping it up.

The thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was promulgated, almost no one objecting. Indeed, so far as the State of Alabama is concerned it had accepted the action of the United States Government and the obvious results of the war, and had already abolished slavery before the Congress of the United States had submitted a proposition to them for that purpose.

As to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, there was a doubt lingering in the minds of some Senators on the republican side of this Chamber as to whether or not the ratifications of that amendment had been in constitutional form, whether or not the Legislatures of the different States had been permitted to give a free and full expression of the voice of the sovereignty of all the respective States in its ratification. The Congress of the United States therefore passed joint resolutions declaring the ratification of that amendment by the States and its promulgation (which had preceded these joint resolutions) by the Secretary of State as being obligatory on the country, and the Senator from Vermont was in this Chamber and I believe voted for those resolutions.

Now, as to the fourteenth amendment will not this one vote suffice the Senator? Will he, after having participated in a joint vote of the two Houses by which the promulgation and the ratification of the fourteenth amendment were solidly established even beyond the power of legislative repeal, now come and ask the Senate of the United States, upon a resolution that does not express the joint views of the two Houses, upon a resolution which he entitles a resolution to be "resolved as the judgment of the Senate" alone, again bring this subject back to the attention of the country and again demand the adoption of a resolution by the Senate that the fourteenth amendment is a part of the Constitution of the United States?

When shall we cease resolving, and when shall we cease confirming or affirming that which we have so solemnly expressed before the world? When the Senator comes to reply, as he seems to feel the necessity of having a reply upon his own resolutions on which he refuses to speak, rather than an opportunity to vindicate them and to explain the necessity of their adoption before the country, let him reply how often does he expect this resolve to be adopted by one House of Congress. When will his demand cease, and when will his eager conscience be satisfied that pledges enough have been given by himself as well as by other honest men that they will comply with their oaths?

The fifteenth amendment was carried so indisputably through the Legislatures of the different States of the Union, and the process of reconstruction had become so fully recognized on the part of the different States who were seeking or had accepted rehabilitation in the Government of the United States, that it was not thought necessary even by the Senator from Vermont, who for years has had an honorable leadership in this body as the great judicial light of the Senate on the republican side, to offer a resolution of like kind with that which was adopted in reference to the fourteenth amendment so as to fasten that upon the conscience of the country. He has left that amendment to stand from the 30th day of March, 1870, until the memorable 8th day of January, 1879, without ever having expressed the existence of a doubt in his own mind, or a suspicion that a doubt existed in any other mind, of the validity of the fifteenth amendment. State after State in the South has conformed its constitution to the fifteenth amendment; and yet the State of Vermont and many States in the North have disdained to do that. Their constitutions stand to-day without actual modification, so far as the acceptance of the fifteenth amendment is concerned, while all the States of the South, except Kentucky, have gone into convention and have conformed by actual ordinances their constitutions precisely to the fifteenth amendment.

Why has it never occurred to the Senator from Vermont to use his justly deserved powers of influence and control, not merely in Vermont and in the Senate of the United States, but throughout the northern country, by going among the Northern States that have reluctantly withheld their confirmation of the fifteenth amendment, and by asking them to do that which the Southern States have done with an earnest desire to show the people of this country that they love its institutions and intend to uphold them? We have heard nothing from him on that subject. Perhaps his engagements in the great duties of the Senate have forbidden him to do it; and I am gratified to know that the expected departure of the Senator from power with his great party following him has at last awakened him to a sense of national duty and that we may expect from him now, the South having conformed its action to the fifteenth amendment, that he will convert himself from this time forward into a sort of missionary agent with a view of trying to induce the Northern States to conform their constitutions to this amendment.

The resolutions which I have had the honor to offer as a substitute for the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont affirm the validity of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution. They do not drag before the country any unnecessary debate or inquiry into the question of the manner of the ratification, or the question whether or not a legal promulgation of a constitutional amendment is not quite sufficient though the States may not have lawfully ratified it, at least until the promulgation is revoked. They do not seek to bring before the country any disturbing question for debate and controversy, having no essential connection with the merits of such a proposition as this; but they fasten themselves at once solidly upon the ground that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments are valid as part of the Constitution and are just as valid as any other parts of it.

Is not the Senator from Vermont satisfied when we declare, and also when we swear, that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments are valid as parts of the Constitution of the United States? Must he go behind the declaration and behind the oath and pick out the facts and the grounds on which we base, in our judgment, the other and only essential fact of the validity of the amendments? Must he probe into our consciences to see whether or not in the processes of reasoning by which we arrive at the conclusion that these constitutional amendments are valid we happen to agree with him and to move with him in lines of perfect parallelism through the whole line of the argument? Or will he not leave us to choose the ground upon which we placed our declaration of their validity when at last we concur with him, as I hope and believe I know that Americans throughout the country do concur, that the amendments are valid? Is not that enough? If it be not enough, I ask the Senator from Vermont to indicate when he comes to reply to my argument, if he shall do so, or any other he may choose to reply to, in what respects he is dissatisfied with the pledge we lay before him, before the country, and before God.

So that far we are agreed, and to that extent the felicitations of the Senator so joyfully expressed by him on the introduction of these resolutions did come happily forth for the peace of the country, and the 8th of January was duly celebrated in this Chamber by our adhesion to an agreement which the Senator supposed we had never made, that these constitutional amendments are actually valid. He had supposed, doubtless, that only the republicans recognized these three amendments as parts of the Constitution when all Senators were sworn to support and obey that instrument.

Now, Mr. President, at this point the divergence begins, and upon one side of these lines of divergence is the Senator from Vermont and those who may choose to follow him in the adoption of his resolutions, and on the other side is the law of the land as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in various express decisions and in various analogies of law which are embodied in solemn decisions of that great tribunal. I had supposed until yesterday that the Senator from Vermont in this discussion preferred to antagonize only the democratic party; but when certain remarks were made by the Senator yesterday, which doubtless came from the fullness of his soul, I discovered that his real quarrel, both in fact and in intention, was with the Supreme Court of the United States. When I discovered that the honorable Senator's attack was at last intended to fall upon the Supreme Court more heavily than upon the democratic party, then I felt great consolation. Until then I feared that in our weakness and in the midst of all the fallacies and errors of which we have been so long supposed to be guilty, perhaps we had failed to surround ourselves with a sufficient protection to resist the shafts of the distinguished Senator. When the case of Warren Mitchell was under consideration a day or two ago, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] said:

> I do not know when that decision of the Supreme Court was made, but whenever it was made, I wish to say, as I have said often before, when my duty as a lawmaker is called upon for action, while I shall treat with great respect the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, I must say that their decisions can have no more influence over me than mine over them.

I was very glad indeed to find that the Senator from Vermont was willing to treat the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States with respect. I dare say that the court must feel complimented with the respect paid to them by the Senator; but that respect it seems is altogether personal, it is a kindly indulgence to their opinions. It certainly is not a respect for the authority of the grave and august tribunal into whose hands I believe, and have always believed, the Constitution of the United States has committed the final decision of questions of constitutional law, and especially those questions of constitutional jurisdiction which separate the different departments of the Government one from another. I have always been led to believe, and I believe it as a democrat, as a Jeffersonian and a Jacksonian democrat, that the decisions of the Supreme Court when they define the boundaries of legislative and judicial jurisdiction between the States and the Federal Government and between the different great departments of the Government of the United States are to be accepted not merely by the people, but also by the States, by the judiciary, by the Congress of the United States, and by the Senate of the United States, as being the lawful and conclusive decision upon those questions. And if the Senator from Vermont desires to attack this doctrine, allow me to say to him that he will have the pleasure also of attacking a democratic principle. His resolutions are distinctly an attack upon that doctrine, and therefore they are an attack upon the democratic party, an attack which we are willing again to accept, which we have many years battled against, and which when we refuse to meet it the democratic party will have gone to naught, its mission will have ended, and its purpose will be no longer for the good of the country. We claim on our side that questions as to the constitutional distribution of powers and jurisdiction between the executive, the judicial, and the legislative departments of this Government may be conclusively decided upon when a case for judicial cognizance arises, in all matters which relate to the boundaries of the jurisdiction, by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The resolutions of the Senator from Vermont remind one of an inverted pyramid, the base of which, being the whole constitution, is high in the air, and the apex of which, being a doctrine applicable to but one amendment, rests upon the earth. The final point in the resolutions and that upon which the whole weight of the structure is brought to bear is as to the power of the punishment of individuals for the violation of certain laws of Congress enacted or to be enacted for the enforcemen of a single amendment. It is very singular, indeed, that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, a man whose abilities I need not even refer to in the Senate for the purpose of convincing any one of their high claim to respect, during ten years of experience and observation upon this subject, should not have discovered until this moment that it was necessary to enact some additional laws for the purpose of exerting the power of Congress over the people under these amendments, and that he had never matured in his own mind any such measure that he could afford to present to the Congress of the United States. He says in the concluding sentence of his resolutions:

> And to this end the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, instructed to prepare and report, as soon as may be, a bill for the protection of such rights, and the punishment of infractions thereof.

Why should it be necessary that the Senate should instruct the Senator who is chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to prepare and report a bill all the details of which are hidden away in his own mind?

The Senator from Vermont is a man of great experience; and if in all his thinking over this subject under the pressure, as I suppose he will urge, of great public necessity, he has not been able to frame a measure to offer to the Senate, or even to suggest in his resolutions the terms or provisions of a specific measure necessary to carry into effect this power of Congress which he asserts, it is remarkable. It is remarkable that after so many years of solemn reflection he should at last leave us so sadly in the dark, and that he should undertake to relieve us by nothing better than a resolution that has no defined purpose and no meaning beyond vague instructions to a committee to inquire as to what is best to be done, unless indeed his present effort has a covert political meaning only, and is not necessary to any practical result that will benefit the country.

The resolutions start out with the proposition that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States have been ratified and are therefore valid. They then present some very specious, plausible, and well-sounding phraseology upon the subject of interests that are common to the people of the States, to which I shall presently advert. Then they go on to infer a duty on the part of Congress to enact laws of a certain general character without specifying the statutes which we should enact. That the Senator should have found his mind so burdened by this great subject, that it should have pressed so heavily upon him as that he was unable to relieve himself of the pressure sufficiently to determine the specific measures by which he hoped to give relief to the country, is something to be lamented. But feeling, I suppose, the enormous weight, the great pressure of public necessity which nobody but the Senator feels, he concluded that it was necessary that he should give to the country at least some wholesome advice in the form of an opinion of the Senate that some additional laws of a certain general character should be enacted for the benefit of the people embraced in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. I would have been pleased to see the Senator come to particulars in this matter. It would have gratified an admiring people to see him add or try to add to the catalogue of laws, many of which have been torn to rags and tatters by the Supreme Court, some additional laws of the same general character, but specific in their nature, which he supposes are necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the amendments of the Constitution; but the Senator has forborne to allow the country to know precisely what is in his mind upon this interesting subject. He merely informs us that he is impressed with the necessity of some legislation, and he proceeds to state its general character without giving us one single particular.

He then proceeds, after he gets through with the duty of Congress, to comment upon the duty of the executive department, and he makes a wild appeal to the executive powers of the country. He says they ought to be exercised with great vigilance and impartiality in the execution of such laws as Congress has enacted and such as Congress will enact, the provisions of which, I have observed before, the Senator has entirely withheld from us.

He then leaves "the whole Constitution" without any guardianship and comes down to the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. He singles them out from the rest of that instrument and undertakes to impress the Senate and the country with the idea that all the interest of this land should be focalized upon the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, the enforcement of which the Senator evidently understands must not only be paramount by comparison with all other parts of the Constitution of the United States, but paramount to every other duty of life, whether performed in this Chamber or out of it.

In order to get this subject fully before the Senate and to lay down certain premises and predicates which the Senator thought were necessary to justify the conclusion stated in the second resolution, (for the whole pith and marrow of this subject is contained in the second resolution,) he proceeds to enunciate certain views of duty and of right and power on the part of certain peoples and communities in the United States, which I think he will find by comparison with the doctrines laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States are not tenable under our Constitution and are not consistent with our form of government. The resolutions declare "that the people of each State have a common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State in the Union." It is somewhat remarkable that the Senator should have left out the Territories and the District of Columbia. Does the honorable Senator suppose that the Constitution of the United States has no force in the District of Columbia or in the Territories? Or is it only in the States that the people of other States have a common interest in having the whole Constitution enforced?

Why is it that, in laying down a constitutional platform for his party, (as I suppose this is to be for his party a broad platform of constitutional orthodoxy,) he omitted the Territories and the District of Columbia? Surely his statesmanship took within its grasp all that belongs to this great country in all its borders, but he seems to have confined himself to the States without reference to the District of Columbia or to the Territories. This was done for the purpose, I suppose, of giving peculiar point and emphasis to the final conclusion through which he expects to visit upon the people of certain States of the Union penalties which Congress has no power to visit upon them. The Senator declares that—

> The people of each State have a common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State in the Union.

Well, that is a poor apology for an American declaration of a right of the people to define it as an interest in the enforcement of the Constitution of the United States, and to so confine the definition that it should stop short of the Territories and of the District of Columbia. Was this a mistake on the part of the Senator from Vermont? No, Mr. President, he is never guilty of such mistakes. He is one of those who never omit to state all that they intended to state. No word gets into his statement which is an expletive; none is left out that is necessary to the full perfectness of the expression. So when he left out the Territories and the District of Columbia he did it ex industria. He did it because he did not believe that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were applicable to the District and the Territories. Does the Senator expect the republican party to confine the Constitution of the United States within these meager and sparing boundaries? The Senator found an inconvenience, probably, in the course of an argument that must include the District of Columbia within all the provisions of the fourteenth amendment.

But he says:

> The people of each State have a common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State in the Union.

That means, of course, in each and every State. Now, let us test that just a moment and let us see whether the people of each State have a common interest in the enforcement of the Constitution in every other State. What is meant by "a common interest?" Does it mean a sentiment? Does it mean a mere concern for another? Does it mean an affectionate regard for the welfare of another State? Does it mean a privilege, a right of interference with the affairs of another State? Or when the Senator uses the word "interest" does he connect the idea with something that is tangible, something that is worth while considering, something that is powerful and influential, that can be put into action?

Now, Mr. President, I must make a disclaimer on the part of the people of Alabama. We never have considered that we had any "common interest" in the enforcement of the Constitution in the State of Vermont; that is, as the people of Alabama, as a people of a State, who under some circumstances and in some sort and on some occasions—all persons allow that they have what is called sovereignty—these people, thus aggregated in Alabama, do not claim that they have an immediate and direct interest in the enforcement of the Constitution in the State of Vermont. They claim that they as citizens of the United States have got an interest in the enforcement of the Constitution of the United States and of the laws thereof in the different States of the Union through the organized constitutional and legal tribunals of this Federal Government; but as the people of the State of Alabama they do not claim that they have either right or jurisdiction to send petitions to Vermont, to send remonstrances to Vermont, to complain of her legislation, to complain of the election of her public agents for the discharge of the duties of the government of that State. They do not claim that they have got the right or power to enforce the "whole Constitution of the United States" in the State of Vermont. If a man is deprived of the right of trial by jury in Vermont, the people of Alabama are not conscious of the fact, or, if they are, they do not think that they have a right as a people to complain of it. If a man, by the constitutional authority of Vermont, has been denied his right to vote under circumstances where he would have the right to vote in Alabama, we do not consider that we have a right as the people in Alabama to complain of the people of Vermont. Neither directly, in applications made to them or by objections suggested to their Legislatures or their governors nor through this common agency the Congress of the United States, do we claim such jurisdiction over Vermont.

The Senator from Vermont in his resolutions declares in effect that the people of Alabama have the right to demand the enforcement of the whole Constitution of the United States in every State of the Union, and Vermont of course is included. We respectfully disavow this delicate and onerous guardianship.

Now, if we turn to the amendments to the Constitution we find that the first amendment relates to the establishment of religion, or the prohibiting the free exercise thereof; to abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

These constitute one class of rights secured by the Constitution to the people of the United States. One of the classes of rights that the Congress of the United States have no right to violate, nor has the government of any State a right to violate them, nor has any judicial tribunal within any State, or any executive officer within any State, a right to violate them; and in order to protect these rights the Constitution of the United States must be enforced within those States. But through what agency must it be enforced? What right, I ask, have the people of Alabama to insist upon the enforcement of rights of this character in the State of Vermont? They may have a moral right; they may have an interest in common with the American people in desiring it; but they have no common agent empowered by law with the jurisdiction to enforce this right on their demand; and therefore, as there is no common agent between these States for this purpose and as these States are themselves independent and separate sovereignties, that which is declared in the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont to be a right of the people of each State is not a right of the people of any State. So with equal force may we refer to the third amendment to the Constitution, which provides that—

> No soldier shall in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

So in regard to the fourth amendment to the Constitution, which provides that—

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

If rights of this kind are violated in the State of Vermont, have I a right, as a citizen of Alabama, (and by a right I mean a legal right, a right coupled with authority, with power to enforce it, a right that can be enforced,) have I an "interest" or right in virtue of which I can go to Vermont and question the conduct of her people and the action of her authorities, and to reverse, interfere with, and to set aside that action? Yet the Senator's resolution includes the whole Constitution and extends to every State, and he declares that the people of each State have the right, under the Constitution of the United States, to enforce the entire instrument in every State of the American Union. If this is not declared by the resolutions nothing of practical value is declared by them.

The utter impossibility of that proposition is apparent upon its face. It would be apparent if we considered nothing but the general outline and character of our Government; but when we come to consider the fact that no intermediary has been named in the Constitution, that no agent has been established there who can exercise these extensive powers on the demand of the State of Vermont or the State of Alabama, then we find the utter fallacy of this generalization of the Senator from Vermont so cleverly expressed in his resolutions.

A common interest to be of any value must be a common right. What is a common right? It is a right that is enjoyed in common, equal to all possessors, if not in degree at least in kind, a right which all may exercise, a right which belongs in community to all. Therefore we would have a common right in the people of all the States, according to the resolutions, to arraign any little State that may be supposed to be violating some provision of the Constitution and compel her to obey it according to our construction of the same. New Hampshire for a long time violated the Constitution, as its doctrines are generally accepted in the United States, by excluding men from office, and I believe even from the right to vote, who were not professors of the Protestant religion. Could the people of any other State have called New Hampshire to account for this? Mr. President, there is no such common right in this country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not disturb my honorable friend, I should be glad to have him read any part of these resolutions where it is said that the people of each State have a common right to enforce the Constitution. The copy that I have printed reads "that the people of each State have a common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State in the Union," and that it is the duty of Congress to see that the whole Constitution is enforced.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very glad that I have brought the Senator from Vermont at last to his feet. I think I have accomplished something, for the Senate should be entitled to hear at least something from him on his own resolutions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not hear the honorable Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I say I think I am entitled to congratulate myself that I have at last got the Senator from Vermont to consent to make some explanation of his resolutions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh no, I have made no explanation, I only asked the Senator to read the resolutions as they stand in the print.

Mr. MORGAN. I have read them. Probably the Senator did not understand my point. I undertook to draw a distinction between a common interest and a common sentiment, and I said I had supposed that the Senator in his careful use of words when he put the word "interest" in his resolutions meant something more than sentiment; because if there is nothing else in question but sentiment I should be disposed to gratify the Senator from Vermont in the indulgence of any amount of kindly interest he may have for the people of Alabama. Indeed I do not know but that under certain circumstances I should be entirely willing to commit the guardianship of those people to the tender care of the Senator from Vermont, for he always takes such good care of his own people, provides so well for them, sees that they have all the rights that they are entitled to under the Constitution of the United States and all the benefactions and all the bounties that this Government can bestow, he is so particularly careful, prudent, wise, and comprehensive in the guardianship of his own people, that if I were compelled to intrust the care of my people to any one as a matter of rightful guardianship I do not know who I would rather have take the charge of my State than the honorable Senator from Vermont. If this were a mere sentimental affair I would be wasting my time in the discussion of it. If the Senator from Vermont will avow on the floor of the Senate that the word "interest" in his resolution does not mean anything more than a concern for, a sentiment for, an interest in, the welfare of the people of the different States, I shall dismiss this branch of the argument.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will send my friend a dictionary rather than disavow it.

Mr. MORGAN. As a matter of course I understand that the Senator from Vermont uses no word without consideration, and when he uses the word "interest" he means the greatest possible interest rather than the least possible interest—I do not know how more justly to express it—than as the greatest possible right rather than the least possible right to go into the States armed with the authority of the people of Vermont for the purpose of exercising such power as they possess to enforce their interest, their right in the control of the people of the different States. Therefore I have not misinterpreted the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont, and after this little colloquy between us I am gratified to know that he has at least come to my construction of his own resolutions.

The Senator from Vermont seems at a late period of my argument to have been disturbed by the suggestions which I have had the honor to make, and I shall not repeat that which is already upon the record, but which I think he will find some occasion to notice when he comes to reflect upon it. But, sir, the interest that he means is the right of control; it means no more and no less than that. The proposition, when put into plain, undisguised English is that the people of Vermont have the right to control the people of Alabama whenever, by act of omission or act of commission, they violate the Constitution of the United States in withholding from a man any right that he may enjoy under the "whole Constitution," or in imposing upon him any burden that he may not be rightfully compelled to bear. That is his proposition; and that is the proposition that I combat. I know it is concealed; it is hidden away in the verbiage used by an astute mind rather to conceal than to portray the actual meaning of the phrase; still there it is. There is the declaration, and that brings us back to the old field of controversy between the federalists and the democrats, wherein it was asserted on the part of the democrats, when they came into the Union, as well as afterward, in the almost contemporaneous amendments to the Constitution, that this right of interference by one State in the local affairs of another State through Congress as a common agency does not exist under the Constitution of the United States. There is the democratic proposition, and there is the issue. Why else did the Senator immediately after the statement of these premises in his resolutions refer to the right and duty of Congress? He says in his resolutions:

> And that it is allke the right and duty of Congress to enforce said amendments

Why did not the Senator say "to enforce the whole Constitution?" When he comes to define the rights and powers and duties of Congress to enforce, why does he limit himself to three amendments and leave out the rest of the Constitution?

It is "the right and duty of Congress." The Senator might have said, "and therefore it is the right and duty of Congress," for that is the proper connection in the syllogism which the Senator presents for our consideration. The first proposition being stated, that the people of the different States have a common interest, a common right, in the enforcement of the Constitution in every State of the Union, then the next step in the statement is, "and it is therefore the duty of Congress to enforce." That duty of Congress is inferred from what? Not from powers granted to Congress by the States that created it; but that duty is inferred from the right, the interest which the Senator says each State has in the enforcement of the Constitution in every other State. I had supposed that it was the American doctrine, accepted by all parties, that the Government of the United States derived its just powers not only from the consent of the governed, but that it derived its just powers by actual and express grant to be found in the Constitution of the United States. But the Senator has found another fountain-spring of authority from which he deduces this power of Congress to control States. That new fountain, no, that old fountain, which has been sealed since the confederation of the States was dispensed with and the new Constitution was adopted, has at last been unsealed by the magic power of the Senator from Vermont, and now we are to be flooded with imperialism as contradistinguished from democracy. We are now to be flooded with that torrent which has threatened to break down all barriers almost every decade for years and years. We are to be told upon the floor of the Senate that these powers which Congress possesses do not arise from the conjoined powers of the different States exercised in the adoption of the Constitution of this country, through which the States bestowed upon the Government of the United States all the powers it possesses, but they arise out of the common interest and common right that the different States have to interfere in the matters which concern locally the people of other States. There is the distinction between the Senator's doctrine and that of the democratic party, and there is the distinction also between the Senator and the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a moment? He made some allusion a short time since, I understand, to the constitution of the State of New Hampshire. I think he stated that some portion of the inhabitants of that State were disfranchised on account of their religion, and not allowed to vote.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I said I thought so. They were deprived of holding office, I know.

Mr. ROLLINS. But that is not correct. They are not deprived of the right to hold office or vote because of their religion.

Mr. MORGAN. I know that at a very recent date even the State of New Hampshire has thawed beneath the genial influence of American principles, and she has at last permitted freedom of religion to get into her constitution.

Mr. ROLLINS. No man is prohibited from holding office in New Hampshire on account of religion.

Mr. MORGAN. She has now allowed him to come in free from religious intolerance. When was that? Will the Senator inform me how long since you made this modification in your constitution?

Mr. ROLLINS. In regard to the right to vote?

Mr. MORGAN. No, in regard to the right to hold office.

Mr. ROLLINS. Since the republican party has had control of the State.

Mr. MORGAN. When was that? I should like to know the date.

Mr. ROLLINS. In 1877 the amendments to the Constitution were ratified by the people.

Mr. MORGAN. There is one other question I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont. Did the Senator from Vermont and his colleague, exercising the right or the interest which the people of Vermont had in the affairs of New Hampshire, go over there and undertake to compel them to reform their constitution so as to make it conform to American principles of government? They lived alongside of New Hampshire for many years. They saw this ban of religious exclusion. They saw every Roman Catholic that was in the State or that might go into it excluded from holding office for many years, for nearly a century. Did the people of the State of Vermont exercise this common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State and go across the border and implore or compel the people of New Hampshire to put this amendment in their constitution? There it stood; there it glared fiercely and defiantly down upon all the rest of the sister republics of the American Union; and the two Senators from Vermont seem to have reconciled themselves to the existence of this uncharitable, this irreligious view of their rights under the Constitution of the United States, without ever having made an effort to have it abrogated from the constitution of New Hampshire.

But there was another tribunal that you might have gone to, indicated in the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont. That was Congress. It was open here to your complaints. I never heard of a democrat who undertook to exclude a man from his right to the full and free enjoyment of religion in this country. If there be such a man in our party to-day, and he will avow it, we will give him a leave of absence, and he shall never return if we can help it unless he reforms his opinions. There stood the Senator, his State side by side with New Hampshire for year after year, and never once thought of coming to Congress to employ this common agent of the Constitution to compel New Hampshire to strike this odious feature out of her Constitution. That is what I am lamenting; that is what I am commenting on. What I feel very much surprised at is that the Senator from Vermont, the author of the resolutions, should to-day find himself compelled by some sudden necessity to undertake to reform the condition of all the rest of the States in the American Union after having so long neglected his duty in reference to his sister State of New Hampshire.

I have the authority of some Senators who are near me for saying that President Pierce, who in the South was as much beloved as he ever was in New Hampshire, was indeed the most doughty champion of the striking out of this odious provision from the constitution of New Hampshire. If this amendment is to be credited to republican progress then I must say that there is that one feature in the conduct of the republican party which I had failed to observe, which entitles them at least to some credit.

Mr. ROLLINS. The party with which President Pierce acted during his life-time, for a long number of years had complete control of New Hampshire, and they did not change the constitution in that respect.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not familiar with the history of that, and I do not propose to get off into the discussion of a question of that kind.

Mr. ROLLINS. I only desire that the Senator should not misrepresent the constitution of New Hampshire; that is all. He stated on the floor of the Senate that a portion of the people of New Hampshire were disfranchised and did not have the right to exercise the right to vote on account of their religion. That is not the case. The people of New Hampshire never deprived any man of his right to vote on account of his religion or color.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. ROLLINS. He stated again that the people of New Hampshire were not allowed to hold office by reason of their religion. That is not true.

Mr. MORGAN. I said that under the constitution of New Hampshire as it formerly existed the people there were not allowed to hold office unless they were members of the Protestant religion.

Mr. ROLLINS. They are allowed to hold office now, and practically even under the old constitution Catholics were allowed to hold office. They were members of our Legislature and were never refused admission.

Mr. MORGAN. I stated distinctly that I understood that the provision related to the right to vote. It seems it never related to the right to vote, but it certainly did relate to the right to hold office. The question that I had on my mind and which I tried to present to the Senate was why it was that these gentlemen who are so eager now to enforce, under the powers and rights of the different States, the Constitution of the United States and apply it to every other State of the American Union were so long asleep upon this proposition.

But I pass from that, Mr. President. The next agency which is called up by the Senator from Vermont for the purpose of carrying into effect his new programme for the enforcement of these three amendments of the Constitution of the United States is the executive department. I will read what the resolution provides on that subject:

> And that it is the duty of the executive department of the Government faithfully and with diligence to carry all such laws into impartial execution.

That means all the laws that exist and all that can exist on this subject. I do not wish to criticise too narrowly the resolution of the Senator from Vermont, and yet, when we remember some very illustrious instances in the life of the Senator, we find ourselves compelled to be very wary in construing his words. When I find a word in a sentence written by him, I suppose naturally that it has some force and a meaning adapted to carry out the precise thought which he wishes to enforce by the adoption of the resolution he proposes. Therefore, when he says that it is the duty of the executive department of the Government faithfully and with diligence to carry all such laws into impartial execution, and then supplements that with a demand for more money to be taxed out of the people by saying that it is the duty of Congress "to appropriate all moneys needful to that end," I naturally stop to inquire how much power the Senator intends to attribute to the executive department of the United States in the enforcement of all such laws now existing, or that may hereafter exist, having relation to this right, which he asserts, of the people of the different States to enforce upon the people of other States their views of the Constitution of the United States.

There is some general misunderstanding about the powers of the executive department in reference to the enforcement of the laws. When the executive department of the United States is put at the head of the Army in the person of the President and the sword is drawn and war is declared, and all laws relating to civil matters are sometimes dispensed with because of the prevalence of a state of war, I can understand then how it becomes the duty of the Chief Executive of the executive department of the Government of the United States, during a time of war, to enforce laws civil and perhaps criminal, and certainly all that are military. I have seen during our late war, and have heard that in previous wars, and particularly in the war with Mexico, the executive department of the United States Government by the use of the sword enforced even civil authority upon subjugated communities. It was done in New Orleans; it was done in Nashville, and in various other places, and before the late war it was done in the city of Mexico. But in a time of peace, when the Constitution prevails, when the civil authority in the land is in full exercise, when there is no impediment or obstruction to the entire and complete enforcement of every law of the land, I do not understand precisely what is meant when it is declared by a resolution of the Senate that it is the duty of the executive department of the Government to enforce all laws.

The first duty of the executive of a government is to obey the laws, not to take them into his own hands and become, according to his own unbridled and uncontrolled will, the enforcer of the laws. That part of the law enacted by Congress which is put into force; that part of it to which the word enforcement relates; that part by which punishments are to be inflicted and penalties are to be enforced, depends for its enforcement not upon the executive department directly and immediately, but upon the judiciary. The executive department is simply the right hand of the judiciary for the purpose of enforcing not the law merely, but the law as declared by the judges and applied to the subject by the courts. The courts enforce the laws, and the executive power aids the courts in executing them. But it was the meaning of the Senator from Vermont, and if it were not, when he takes the floor I ask him to deny it, to leave out of consideration the power and right of the judiciary of the country and to place the enforcement of the law right where his resolutions place it, in the hands of the Executive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Lest I should forget it, I will deny it now.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator denies it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Lest I may forget it.

Mr. MORGAN. Then with great respect and deference, I commend to the Senator from Vermont some improvement in the language of his resolution. Then he means, as I understand him, that it is the duty of the Executive, in reference to the civil authority and civil law prevailing in time of peace, without obstruction, that he will first receive from the courts their judgments and their decisions, and he will enforce them; or, if it be necessary to put the courts into action through the Department of Justice, that he will cause the executive officers of the Government connected with the Department of Justice to bring the laws of the United States into action by giving information and by making prosecutions of offenders in the courts. If that be the meaning of the Senator from Vermont, then I concur with him; but if he means instead of this that the Executive of the United States has the right to use the Army in the enforcement of a law, when no court has required its use; if he means that the President of the United States can use the Army to levy an execution or to conduct a man to jail who has been condemned to imprisonment, or to collect a fine out of a man who has been amerced; if he means to attribute to the executive department of this Government the constitutional right and authority to employ other agencies than those that are prescribed by the civil law to assist the courts, and to use them in what he calls the enforcement of the law, then the Senator and I differ in regard to the constitutional power of the Executive of this land on that subject. Especially do we differ if the Senator uses the word "enforce" in the sense of executing the judgment of the law as pronounced by the Executive, instead of the judgment as pronounced by the courts.

I was led to make this inference more particularly by the fact that in the selection of agencies to enforce the supposed rights of the people of the States against the people of other States, the Senator entirely overlooks the Supreme Court of the United States and entirely omits to pay any attention to the judicial power of the country. The judges or the courts are not mentioned in his resolutions. If he had put some glimpse of judicial authority within our view in the wording of his resolutions, we might at least have had the consolation to believe that the Senator did not intend, through the alleged common interest of the people of the several States under the Constitution and the power of Congress, to enforce their common interest and the power of the Executive to put its decrees into execution; to usurp all authority over individual men in every State in the Union, to the exclusion of the courts and their powers; to declare the law, and to declare its judgments.

But the Senator may, as indicated in his remarks made the other day, have some want of respect for the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, and I dare say that his omission to allude to the Supreme Court of the United States in his resolutions was in consequence of the fact that he regarded the court as being more his antagonist upon the propositions in his resolutions even than Senators on this side of the Chamber. It may be, and I believe it to be, true that every Senator on this side of the Chamber does not concur in every expression that the Supreme Court has made upon these identical questions. That may be so; but we believe that when the Supreme Court of the United States has solemnly decided that Congress has not a certain power over States and the citizens thereof, it is not within the competency of the Senate of the United States, to say the least of it, nor do we believe that it is within the competency of both Houses backed by the approval of an act of Congress by the President of the United States, to annul that decision. The court can annul their decisions, but who can annul the court's decrees? The Senator passes by the courts; he makes no allusion to them. He does not appear to want their assistance in the enforcement of his views of constitutional law in this matter. He would rather not have assistance from them. They are against him, and as a matter of course he does not wish their aid. He does not think it is a proper time to appeal to an enemy to assist him in getting through with the difficulties which he is now experiencing in his own mind, and so he passes them by. But how different is the situation of the people of this country. Let me ask the Senators on this floor if they are aware of any sentiment in the American mind stronger than that of reverence, love, and confidence in the honest judicial tribunals of the land. These are the tribunals where the law makes its immediate approach to and comes directly in contact with the individual man. Men feel the power of the law as well as the benignity of its justice through the agencies of the courts of the country. The Government scarcely ever touches them except through the power of the judiciary and of the tax-collector. The tax-collector comes as a man to demand tribute for the support of the institutions of the Government, and he is received always with reluctance; but the judge comes with that sort of sacred authority which seems to have descended, as in the old times upon the Israelitish tribes, through a commission from Heaven; and the people look upon the judges with awe and with reverence, with love and confidence. I would not disturb that confidence. I would not dislodge the affections of the American people from the judiciary. If I were going to lay a vandal hand upon that which is the most useful and at the same time the most vital principle of our Government, I would lay it upon the ermine of the judges. I would tear them from their benches and I would disperse them amid the rabble. If I desired to poison the whole land and fill it with woes I would corrupt the judiciary.

No, sir, there is no one thing the American people—and by the American people I speak of the great mass of mankind included in those forty millions of our fellow-citizens—there is no one thing that they look to with so deep and fond regard, with such a strong feeling of attachment as they do to the protecting power of the judiciary and to its sense of justice. No man, it makes no difference how great he may be, will ever succeed in winning his way to the profound confidence of the American people who commences by discarding the authority of the supreme tribunal of the land. I am for the protection of this beneficent department of the Government. I am for making the people always feel, if possible, that the judges are pure and upright; that their sentences are delivered from clean breasts, and that justice is executed with clean hands. So long as we can keep the minds of the American people wedded to this one great fact, or to the belief of it, we need have no fear of the falling away or final destruction of our institutions. In the midst of the deepest disasters and darkest gloom this one feeling will recall to their minds the benefits of this form of government, and they will love it in spite of its shame and degradation, and they will restore it, after a fall, in preference to all other forms of government.

I believe, and I think I am authorized to speak for the democratic party in this Chamber and elsewhere, that they believe in the right of the Supreme Court of the United States to declare and to decide finally questions of constitutional law. That is my belief. I yield obedience to it. I do so as a Senator as well as a citizen. I never have supposed that the commission which I have the honor to bear from my State gave me authority to come here and to controvert with that tribunal in reference to the constitutional powers which we may exercise as the Senate of the United States in the enactment of laws. I am not for bills to be introduced and carried through here to repeal decisions of the Supreme Court in reference to the powers of Congress. When any Senator rises in his place with a bill entitled, as such bills ought to be, a bill to repeal the law as declared in a decision of the United States Supreme Court, that decision being with reference to the constitutionality of a law of the United States, I shall hold and claim that that measure is out of order, and that we have no right to legislate upon it.

Such is the effect of the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont. The resolutions of the Senator from Vermont, as I shall proceed to show upon authority, are resolutions to repeal decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and though he with his great learning and ability, which all acknowledge, may believe in his conscience that these laws were not justly declared to be constitutional, that these decisions were inadvertently or unwisely made, yet I must stand by the tribunal which as a co-ordinate department of the Government has the right assigned to it by the Constitution of sitting in judgment upon all questions that arise between the United States and the people that come before it in the due course of law.

The Senator will have to excuse me if I cannot go with him, however much I might be charmed by the clearness and force of his objections, in refusing to observe a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon a constitutional question. I now pass to those decisions. After having shown that the Senator from Vermont passed them by on the other side, I desire to do that which I should despair of doing without such support—to fortify myself in these great constitutional barriers thrown around the position which I have chosen to occupy on this occasion against the otherwise dangerous power of the Senator from Vermont. When the Senator comes to reply to me he will have a very difficult task, not because of anything that I have said or anything that I may say, but before the Senator can get at me to lay his ponderous hand on me to crush me, as doubtless he thinks he may, into dust, he must pass the barricades of the Supreme Court of the United States behind which I take shelter. The war is not between me and the Senator from Vermont. The war is between the Supreme Court of the United States and the Senator from Vermont, and I think myself most happy, at all events, being new here and from a country whose opinions are not always entirely acceptable, that I have the opportunity on this occasion of expressing my opinions which are stated in my substitute by merely literal extracts from the decisions of the Supreme Court.

But I must do an honorable Senator on this floor some justice before I read these opinions of the Supreme Court. I allude to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] The speech of that Senator from which I ask the Secretary to read some extracts was delivered in this Chamber on the 23d of January, 1872, upon a discussion of the civil-rights bill. My purpose in having this speech or parts of it read is to show that the doctrines which were afterward stated in the decisions of the Supreme Court, which I shall presently read, were democratic doctrines. Here was the Senator from Ohio, then in quite a small minority in this Chamber, without much support anywhere, and I might say with no support at all except the friendly sympathy of the few Senators who clustered about him and a firm belief in the great principles of the Constitution as he understood them and as they were understood by the democratic party, rising to a discussion of that most exciting subject and forecasting almost in words, certainly in fullness and completeness of statement, all the ideas that were embraced in the decisions of the Supreme Court that were afterward made on these very questions. So I think, without going further back to trace historically the origin of these principles of government, and these distinctions between the powers of the different departments of the Government, than to the date when the honorable Senator from Ohio presented his argument, I may safely say that that argument was a full portrayal of the doctrines which are now held by the democratic party. I believe I shall take shelter under both the Supreme Court and the Senator from Ohio. I ask the Secretary to read the part which I have marked in the speech of the Senator from Ohio.

The Secretary read as follows:

> Now, let us have a word or two upon the Constitution, for my friend from Indiana has considered that the Constitution must be looked into a little. He lays down this broad proposition, that whatever rights are conferred upon citizens of the United States by the Federal Constitution are taken under the protection of that Constitution, and may be enforced by Congress by appropriate legislation. I might grant that proposition and it would not touch the question before us; for there would still remain to be considered whether the rights of the citizen are conferred by the Federal Constitution. That is the first question. Then, secondly, if rights, &c., are so conferred, are the rights, privileges, or immunities assumed by the Senator from Massachusetts in his amendment among them? If either of these questions be answered in the negative, then the Senator's proposition has no application. Thirdly, comes the question, assuming that we have the power to enforce or secure rights, privileges, and immunities conferred or guaranteed by the Constitution, in what manner are we authorized to enforce or secure them; quo modo can we enforce or secure them? And if it be found that you cannot constitutionally enforce or secure them in the mode proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, that is a conclusive answer to his amendment. If there is some other mode in which you can enforce them according to the Constitution, that other mode is the proper mode. That is the "appropriate legislation" which it is provided that Congress may adopt.
> But, says the Senator, these are questions not left to the courts, because it is provided in the fourteenth amendment, in the last clause of it, that "Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article." Need the Senator from Indiana be told that Congress would have precisely the same power if that section were stricken out; that that section is no broader than the section of the original Constitution which gives to Congress the power to enact all legislation necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the Constitution or the powers conferred upon any department of the Government by it?
> This very language, "appropriate legislation," is taken from an opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland, if my memory is right, in which he makes the terms "necessary legislation" and "appropriate legislation" synonymous and convertible terms. So that this language, "Congress shall have power by appropriate legislation to enforce the provisions of this article," is nothing more than the implied power which Congress would have if the section were stricken out of the article altogether; nothing more than Congress had under the old provision authorizing it to enact all legislation necessary to carry out the powers conferred upon the Government or upon any department thereof. That is all. It is not a substantive grant of power; it is simply putting into the form of an express power that which would have been an implied power were this provision not in the Constitution at all. Does that take the question out of the jurisdiction of the courts? No, sir; not at all. What, then, is "appropriate legislation?" I will tell you what is appropriate legislation. The Constitution consists of several categories or classes, so to speak. One is a grant of powers to the Federal Government; another class is a prohibition against the exercise of powers by the Federal Government; and the third class is a prohibition upon the exercise of certain powers by the States. This is the Constitution of the United States: affirmatively, a grant of power; negatively, a prohibition of power on the part of the Federal Government, and a prohibition against the exercise of power by the State governments. The fourteenth amendment in the main is confined to this latter category or class. It prohibits the States from exercising certain powers, and the remedy is precisely the same if a State shall violate that provision of the Constitution that it would be if it were to violate one of the provisions in the original Constitution.
> What says the original Constitution? "No State shall coin money." Suppose a State does coin money, how do you get at that? You get at that under your law in this way: the act of legislation which authorized the coinage is declared by your Federal courts, to which the question can be taken, to be a violation of the Constitution of the United States and void. So with any other prohibition. Here the fourteenth amendment declares, and it is unnecessary to read any more of it perhaps than that which bears on this bill: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." That operates directly on the State. It cannot be denied that that operates directly on the State as a political entity, because it cannot be contended for a moment that a manager of a theater can make a law of the State, and yet this bill is leveled at him; that an innkeeper can make a law of the State, and yet this bill is leveled at him; that a railroad company can make the law of the State, and yet this bill is leveled at it. No, sir, the law of the State can be made only by the legislative power of the State, its General Assembly.

When, therefore, this Constitution says that no State shall make a law abridging the privileges or immunities of a citizen, it is the same as if it had said that no Legislature of any State shall pass any such law, for that is the only way in which the State can make a law. But it would have been, perhaps, a lame instrument if that was all, and hence it says no State shall enforce any law which abridges the privileges or immunities of a citizen of the United States. Why is that word "enforced" put in there? It was put in for a twofold reason: first, because there were already on the statute-books of some of the States enactments that did discriminate between different classes of citizens; that is, between those who were made citizens by this amendment and those who were formerly citizens. For instance, in the State of Kentucky, at the time this amendment was passed, a negro man could not testify against a white man; and I am told that the State law on that subject has not been repealed. Very well. Here, then, comes in this constitutional provision that Kentucky shall not enforce that law. It was because of these statutes that were upon the statute-books of some of the States already made, not to be made, that this provision was put in that the States shall not enforce any law which makes any such discrimination. But I am willing to go further than that, and say that a State shall not enforce a common-law principle of that State which makes a discrimination forbidden by this Constitution, and that if the State, through its highest authority entitled to enforce that law, does enforce it, if it makes a discrimination repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, then that matter shall be reviewed and justice done, and the Constitution vindicated. But how can that be? How can such a case happen? It can only happen when the highest judicial power in the State has determined to enforce such a law repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. That is the only way in which it can be enforced.

Mr. MORGAN. That, Mr. President, was the democratic forecast of the doctrines of the Constitution of the United States in reference to a measure, of which there is a series close akin to each other, which was then being urged by the Senator from Vermont, and which since that time has been considered by the Supreme Court of the United States. I think if the people of the United States had no other cause of high regard for the Senator from Ohio than that which is disclosed in the remarks which I have just had read from the Clerk's desk, followed up as they have been by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States fully affirming them, he would be entitled to their profound gratitude throughout his life and through coming ages; for the circumstances in which those doctrines were enunciated were dark and dangerous, and it required the heroism of one who fully comprehended what the Constitution of the United States required and permitted, to rise at that time and invoke the principles of that great instrument as the basis upon which he planted his opposition to measures that at that moment of time commended themselves to a most excited state of political feeling.

I have been totally unable to see any practical good that could result from a discussion of these resolutions, and have therefore from time to time voted against their being called up, and I am still unable to see that there is any practical good to the country to arise from their discussion, which on my part I intend to conduct in perfectly good temper. I have been at a loss to understand or conjecture even why the Senator from Vermont should have been so urgent in his efforts to force them upon the attention of the country now for more than twenty days; but I suppose that the Senator from Vermont, in taking his farewell of the power of control in the Senate, feels that it is necessary that he should leave some memorial behind him from which we could gather a very express declaration, if not a very clear one, under the solemn form of a last will and testament in reference to the principles of construction of the Constitution of the United States. Under these painful and even mournful circumstances I have thought that it was perhaps proper, and that it was a matter of due respect to the Senator from Vermont, though not a very useful diversion from our business, that the country should pause in all of its great interests for a while to hear his dying declaration upon the Constitution. Yet I have sometimes thought in considering this matter that perhaps he was like the man who was found by our Saviour wandering among the tombs. While the man was perfectly sane, as it appeared, he yet was possessed of some tormenting spirit. He was possessed of some inward disturbance which in spite of the man would cry out, "We know thee, who thou art." I suppose the Senator is moved by a feeling of resentment which lingers if it does not rankle in his bosom, when he comes to think of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and while he is bidding farewell to power, and is wandering through the great radical national cemetery, he, like the man wandering among the tombs, cries out, when he finds resting upon him the eye of the Supreme Court, "We know thee, who thou art! Why hast thou come to torment us before the time?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is another passage of Scripture that I think will apply better.

Mr. MORGAN. Let me have it, and I will make my comment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I will not disturb you. I am not at all surprised that the Senator, even possessed as I supposed he might be, should quote Scripture, for we have high authority for it.

Mr. MORGAN. Some have been very apt at the business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have not only one very apt, but we have the example just now.

Mr. MORGAN. I now propose to read an extract from the United States vs. Fox, 5 Otto, 672:

> There is no doubt of the competency of Congress to provide by suitable penalties for the enforcement of all legislation necessary or proper to the execution of powers with which it is intrusted. And as it is authorized "to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," it may embrace within its legislation whatever may be deemed important to a complete and effective bankrupt system. The object of such a system is to secure a ratable distribution of the bankrupt's estate among his creditors, when he is unable to discharge his obligations in full, and at the same time to relieve the honest debtor from legal proceedings for his debts upon a surrender of his property.

I do not care to read the entire decision. I have shown the sort of case in which the following declaration of law was made by the Supreme Court. The court proceed to say:

> Any act committed with a view of evading the legislation of Congress passed in the execution of any of its powers, or of fraudulently securing the benefit of such legislation, may properly be made an offense against the United States. But an act committed within a State, whether for a good or a bad purpose, or whether with an honest or a criminal intent, cannot be made an offense against the United States, unless it have some relation to the execution of a power of Congress, or to some matter within the jurisdiction of the United States. An act not having any such relation is one in respect to which the State can alone legislate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the act in that case?

Mr. MORGAN. It was the making of a fraudulent assignment before the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced. Upon like authority I will proceed to show how the powers of Congress and the jurisdiction of the United States originate, because unless we understand how the powers of Congress and the jurisdiction of the United States originated we never shall be able to understand the reach of those powers or the conditions upon which they may be exercised. I read now from Munn vs. Illinois, 4 Otto, 123. Mr. Chief-Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court. It is a very lengthy opinion, and I propose to read only a few extracts from it, but such as pertain to the adjudication in the case. One of the judges dissented, Mr. Justice Strong. The chief-justice said:

> The question to be determined in this case is whether the General Assembly of Illinois can, under the limitations upon the legislative power of the States imposed by the Constitution of the United States, fix by law the maximum of charges for the storage of grain in warehouses at Chicago and other places in the State having not less than one hundred thousand inhabitants, "in which grain is stored in bulk, and in which the grain of different owners is mixed together, or in which grain is stored in such a manner that the identity of different lots or parcels cannot be accurately preserved."

That was the question to be determined. Chief-Justice Waite proceeding to ascertain the grounds of this jurisdiction declared as follows:

> The Constitution contains no definition of the word "deprive" as used in the fourteenth amendment.

I desire to call attention again to that proposition:

> To determine its signification, therefore, it is necessary to ascertain the effect which usage has given it, when employed in the same or like connection.
>
> While this provision of the amendment is new in the Constitution of the United States, as a limitation upon the powers of the States, it is old as a principle of civilized government. It is found in Magna Charta, and, in substance if not in form, in nearly or quite all the constitutions that have been from time to time adopted by the several States of the Union. By the fifth amendment, it was introduced into the Constitution of the United States as a limitation upon the powers of the National Government; and by the fourteenth, as a guarantee against any encroachment upon an acknowledged right of citizenship by the Legislatures of the States.
> When the people of the united colonies separated from Great Britain they changed the form, but not the substance, of their government. They retained for the purposes of government all the powers of the British Parliament, and through their State constitutions, or other forms of social compact, undertook to give practical effect to such as they deemed necessary for the common good and the security of life and property. All the powers which they retained they committed to their respective States, unless in express terms or by implication reserved to themselves. Subsequently, when it was found necessary to establish a national government for national purposes, a part of the powers of the States and of the people of the States was granted to the United States and the people of the United States. This grant operated as a further limitation upon the powers of the States, so that now the governments of the States possess all the powers of the Parliament of England, except such as have been delegated to the United States or reserved by the people. The reservations by the people are shown in the prohibitions of the constitutions.

Without further following in this opinion a very extensive elaboration of the same proposition and numerous citations of authorities in its support, I rest upon that part of the opinion that I have read as containing the proper definition of the origin of the jurisdiction of the United States and of the powers of Congress, and also as containing perhaps as strong a statement as was ever made by Thomas Jefferson in any of his utterances or resolutions of the doctrine of the reserved powers of the States and of the people in all their breadth and fullness and intensity.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will suggest to my honorable friend in that connection that the word "deprived" I think does not occur in Magna Charta.

Mr. MORGAN. I neither said that the word "deprived" occurred in Magna Charta nor did I say it occurred in the Constitution of the United States except in the instances I cited, but that the Supreme Court of the United States have decided that there is no constitutional definition of the word "deprive."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood my honorable friend to say that it was in Magna Charta.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, no, I read from the book. The book does not so state it.

I am making this discussion much longer than I would have done because the Senator from Vermont has compelled me to anticipate him in the argument, and I cannot know in advance what ground the Senator will take. The next proposition, however, that I propose to discuss, or rather to cite authority upon, is, How are the powers of Congress and the jurisdiction of the United States, taking the Government as a whole, related to or affected by the question of citizenship? For the purpose of getting a complete definition of citizenship I refer to the Slaughter-house cases in 16 Wallace. For the purpose of getting the pith of this decision before the Senate in a condensed form I will read but little from the body of the decision, but I shall read the syllabus of the case, which I believe has been fairly extracted by the reporter. I have not compared every part of the syllabus with the body of the decision, but I have not any doubt that this very accurate and careful reporter has fully presented the points of decision:

2. The Parliament of Great Britain and the State Legislatures of this country have always exercised the power of granting exclusive rights when they were necessary and proper to effectuate a purpose which had in view the public good, and the power here exercised is of that class, and has until now never been denied.

Such power is not forbidden by the thirteenth article of amendment and by the first section of the fourteenth article. An examination of the history of the causes which led to the adoption of those amendments and of the amendments themselves demonstrates that the main purpose of all the three last amendments was the freedom of the African race, the security and perpetuation of that freedom, and their protection from the oppressions of the white men who had formerly held them in slavery.

3. In giving construction to any of those articles it is necessary to keep this main purpose steadily in view, though the letter and spirit of those articles must apply to all cases coming within their purview, whether the party concerned be of African descent or not.

While the thirteenth article of amendment was intended primarily to abolish African slavery, it equally forbids Mexican peonage or the Chinese cooly trade, when they amount to slavery or involuntary servitude; and the use of the word "servitude" is intended to prohibit all forms of involuntary slavery of whatever class or name.

The first clause of the fourteenth article was primarily intended to confer citizenship on the negro race, and secondly to give definitions of citizenship of the United States and citizenship of the States, and it recognizes the distinction between citizenship of the State and citizenship of the United States by those definitions.

The second clause protects from the hostile legislation of the States the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States as distinguished from the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States.

These latter, as defined by Justice Washington in Corfield vs. Coryell, and by this court in Ward vs. Maryland, embrace generally those fundamental civil rights for the security and establishment of which organized society is instituted, and they remain, with certain exceptions mentioned in the Federal Constitution, under the care of the State governments, and of this class are those set up by plaintiffs.

4. The privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States are those which arise out of the nature and essential character of the National Government, the provisions of its Constitution, or its laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof; and it is these which are placed under the protection of Congress by this clause of the fourteenth amendment.

It is not necessary to inquire here into the full force of the clause forbidding a State to enforce any law which deprives a person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, for that phrase has been often the subject of judicial construction, and is, under no admissible view of it applicable to the present case.

5. The clause which forbids a State to deny to any person the equal protection of the laws was clearly intended to prevent the hostile discrimination against the negro race so familiar in the States where he had been a slave, and for this purpose the clause confers ample power in Congress to secure his rights and his equality before the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did he not say a little more on that same topic?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not read from the body of the opinion; the body of the opinion is too extensive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon of the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I read the syllabus. If there is anything said beyond this in the decision that changes or in the slightest degree affects the accuracy of the syllabus I have not been made aware of it. I will read now on page 72 from the body of the opinion, which relates to the subject of citizenship:

The first section of the fourteenth article, to which our attention is more specially invited, opens with a definition of citizenship—not only citizenship of the United States, but citizenship of the States. No such definition was previously found in the Constitution, nor had any attempt been made to define it by act of Congress. It had been the occasion of much discussion in the courts, by the Executive Departments, and in the public journals. It had been said by eminent judges that no man was a citizen of the United States except as he was a citizen of one of the States composing the Union. Those, therefore, who had been born and resided always in the District of Columbia or in the Territories, though within the United States, were not citizens. Whether this proposition was sound or not had never been judicially decided. But it had been held by this court, in the celebrated Dred Scott case, only a few years before the outbreak of the civil war, that a man of African descent, whether a slave or not, was not, and could not be, a citizen of a State or of the United States. This decision, while it met the condemnation of some of the ablest statesmen and constitutional lawyers of the country, had never been overruled; and if it was to be accepted as a constitutional limitation of the right of citizenship, then all the negro race who had recently been made freemen were still not only not citizens, but were incapable of becoming so by anything short of an amendment to the Constitution.

To remove this difficulty primarily, and to establish a clear and comprehensive definition of citizenship which should declare what should constitute citizenship of the United States, and also citizenship of a State, the first clause of the first section was framed:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside."

The first observation we have to make on this clause is, that it puts at rest both the questions which we stated to have been the subject of differences of opinion. It declares that persons may be citizens of the United States without regard to their citizenship of a particular State, and it overturns the Dred Scott decision by making all persons born within the United States and subject to its jurisdiction citizens of the United States. That its main purpose was to establish the citizenship of the negro can admit of no doubt. The phrase, "subject to its jurisdiction," was intended to exclude from its operation children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign States born within the United States.

The next observation is more important in view of the arguments of counsel in the present case. It is, that the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established. Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the State to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union.

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States, and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of the plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same, and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State—that the word citizen of the State should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to citizen of the United States, in the very sentence that precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Or, I might add, against interference with the legislative power of another State—

Of the privileges and the immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and the immunities of the citizen of the State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

I will now omit much of what I expected to have read from the body of this decision merely out of deference to the Senate, whose time I have already occupied longer than I could have desired to do, and whose attention I would certainly not have imposed upon to this great extent had it not been that I felt it incumbent upon me, not merely as a Senator, but as a representative of one of the States which seem to be in the mind's eye of the Senator from Vermont, to try to place the argument upon which we protect ourselves against his resolutions upon ground that has received the sanction of the Supreme Court of the United States. I will therefore omit to read much of this opinion and proceed to this extract:

Having shown that the privileges and immunities relied on in the argument are those which belong to citizens of the States as such, and that they are left to the State governments for security and protection, and not by this article placed under the special care of the Federal Government, we may hold ourselves excused from defining the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which no State can abridge, until some case involving those privileges may make it necessary to do so.—Slaughter-House Case, 16 Wallace, 78.

I now proceed, Mr. President, to the consideration of the matter involved in the second resolution of the Senator from Vermont, but to which the first was intended as a prelude or a preface, the jurisdiction of Congress over the subject of the right to vote; and here I would remark, as every Senator knows very well, that there is a broad distinction between the right to vote and the regulation of the manner of the exercise of that right; and while it has been contended in Congress and elsewhere that the Congress of the United States has the unquestioned right to direct the manner of voting in elections for Representatives, the question as presented now to the consideration of the Senate has no relation to the manner of voting, but the primary and fundamental question is in reference only to the right to vote.

First, this right to vote, so far as it is affected by the Constitution of the United States, relates only to those who receive citizenship directly as a grant from the Constitution, and who by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude are capable of having the right to vote denied to them upon this ground. Those who receive their citizenship by direct and positive grant from the Constitution of the United States may have their right to vote protected by the laws of Congress to the extent that that right is interfered with by any State, on account of race, or color, or previous condition. The power of Congress is confined to the power of preventing the denial by the State or by the United States of the right of such person to vote, when that right is denied or abridged on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The fourteenth and fifteenth amendments are exhaustively discussed and almost every question that can arise under them has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Cruikshank vs. the United States and in the case of Reese, both of which are reported in the second volume of Otto's Reports. In the case of the United States vs. Reese, which originated in the district of Kentucky, Mr. Chief-Justice Waite again delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes here by reason of a division of opinion between the judges of the circuit court in the district of Kentucky. It presents an indictment containing four counts under sections 3 and 4 of the act of May 31, 1870—against two of the inspectors of a municipal election in the State of Kentucky, for refusing to receive and count at such election the vote of William Garner, a citizen of the United States of African descent. All the questions presented by the certificate of division arose upon general demurrers to the several counts of the indictment.

In this court the United States abandon the first and third counts, and expressly waive the consideration of all claims not arising out of the enforcement of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution.

After this concession, the principal question left for consideration is whether the act under which the indictment is found can be made effective for the punishment of inspectors of elections who refuse to receive and count the votes of citizens of the United States, having all the qualifications of voters, because of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

That proposition involved the whole question of the power and jurisdiction of Congress over these individuals within the States.

If Congress has not declared an act done within a State to be a crime against the United States, the courts have no power to treat it as such. (United States vs. Hudson, 7 Cranch, 32.) It is not claimed that there is any statute which can reach this case unless it be the one in question.

Looking, then, to this statute, we find that its first section provides that all citizens of the United States who are or shall be otherwise qualified by law to vote at any election, &c., shall be entitled and allowed to vote thereat without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, any constitution, &c., of the State to the contrary notwithstanding. This simply declares a right without providing a punishment for its violation.

The opinion goes on then to state the provisions of the second, third, and fourth sections of this law, which I will remark here is one of the laws of the same general character mentioned in the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont, and yet the Supreme Court of the United States declares in this decision that these laws are not within the jurisdiction of Congress for the purpose of punishing a citizen of a State who in a State election denies to a colored man the right to vote on any account except that of race, color, or previous condition, and leaves the question open as to this one only exception. The court go on to state their reasons for their adjudication:

The fifteenth amendment does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one.

I should be glad to hear the Senator from Vermont combat with the Supreme Court of the United States upon that proposition.

I might have contented myself in this argument with simply stating this proposition. But it seems that we have not only to convince the Senator and those who may follow him of what the Supreme Court has declared to be the law, but we are also required to convince them, or at least to try to do so, that that law thus declared has any just influence or obligatory force upon the conscience of Senators on this floor.

This fifteenth amendment, in reference to which the court further proceeds to discuss, is thus treated:

It prevents the States, as the United States, however, from giving preference, in this particular, to one citizen of the United States over another on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Before this adoption, this could be done. It was as much within the power of a State to exclude citizens of the United States from voting on account of race, &c., as it was on account of age, property, or education.

I will read before I take my seat the provisions of the constitutions of several of the States as they now remain, and particularly those of Massachusetts and some other States which expressly forbid the exercise of the right of suffrage within those States except upon the condition expressed in the constitution that a person should be compelled to read or perhaps to read and write. I have the volume before me and will presently call attention to it. But Senators who are interested in protecting the power of their own States that through constitutional ordinances have imposed these restrictions upon the right of voting in their States, whether that right is claimed by citizens of the United States or by citizens of the States, I think will feel interested in the support which the Supreme Court has given to the constitutionality of their own constitutions when considered with reference to the supreme law of the land, for this court declares, and declares rightfully, that it was then and is yet as much within the power of a State to exclude citizens of the United States from voting on account of race, &c., as it was on account of age, property, or education, except so far as the fifteenth amendment has abridged that right by prohibiting to the States the power to exclude from the right of suffrage those who are excluded on the ground of race, color, or previous condition of servitude:

If citizens of one race having certain qualifications are permitted by law to vote, those of another having the same qualifications must be. Previous to this amendment, there was no constitutional guarantee against this discrimination; now there is. It follows that the amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right which is within the protecting power of Congress.

And that language I have copied into the substitute which I have had the honor of offering to the Senate.

That right is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. This, under the express provisions of the second section of the amendment, Congress may enforce by "appropriate legislation."

This leads us to inquire whether the act now under condsideration is "appropriate legislation" for that purpose.

The Senator seems to have adopted this act and all acts of a kindred character as "appropriate legislation," because he refers to them as I have frequently observed by a general characterization, having relation to that class of legislation which the Congress of the United States has heretofore enacted without reference to what may have been done with those acts under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I read further:

The power of Congress to legislate at all upon the subject of voting at State elections rests upon this amendment. The effect of article 1, section 4, of the Constitution, in respect to elections for Senators and Representatives, is not now under consideration. It has not been contended, nor can it be, that the amendment confers authority to impose penalties for every wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at State elections.

And yet the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont, as I understand, comprehend all this power and demand its exercise on the part of the Senate.

It is only when the wrongful refusal at such an election is because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude that Congress can interfere and provide for its punishment. If, therefore, the third and fourth sections of the act are beyond that limit, they are unauthorized.

And so the Supreme Court go on to argue and decide:

If Congress had the power to provide generally for the punishment of those who unlawfully interfere to prevent the exercise of the elective franchise without regard to such discrimination, the language of these sections would be broad enough for that purpose.

Certainly they would be broad enough, but the difficulty with the argument is that Congress does not possess the power, it is not found in the Constitution, and you cannot impute the power to Congress under the Constitution by mere argumentation, induction, or inference. You must when you come to look for this power on the part of the Congress of the United States find it in the Constitution, either arising by an express grant or by a necessary implication in favor of its right declared in the Constitution to pass all laws necessary for carrying the provisions of the Constitution of the United States into effect. I read again as follows:

There is no attempt in the sections now under consideration to provide specifically for such an offense. If the case is provided for at all, it is because it comes under the general prohibition against any wrongful act or unlawful obstruction in this particular. We are, therefore, directly called upon to decide whether a penal statute enacted by Congress, with its limited powers, which is in general language broad enough to cover wrongful acts without as well as within the constitutional jurisdiction, can be limited by judicial construction so as to make it operate only on that which Congress may rightfully prohibit and punish.

The court then go on to say that they are not bound, neither are they authorized, when they find Congress exercising a part of its power and in the same enactment or resolution exercising an authority that does not belong to it, to separate that which is bad and superfluous from that which may be good and enforce only that which may be good under the Constitution, because the legislative will of Congress went further and comprehended more, it transgressed the domain of authority in which it had no rightful influence and therefore its undertaking to spread its authority so broadly vitiated the entire act.

The courts enforce the legislative will when ascertained, if within the constitutional grant of power. Within its legitimate sphere, Congress is supreme, and beyond the control of the courts; but if it steps outside of its constitutional limitations, and attempts that which is beyond its reach, the courts are authorized to and when called upon in due course of legal proceedings must, annul its encroachments upon the reserved power of the States and the people.—United States vs. Reese et al., 2 Otto, 215-221.

Thus the Supreme Court of the United States declared their solemn duty, as well as their right, to annul the encroachments of Congress upon a domain of power not conferred on Congress in the Constitution of the United States, and though Senators may choose to differ in opinion with the Supreme Court, no Senator, no Senate, no Congress, no enacting power of the United States which embodies its will in the form of a law can ever put that law into execution, when it is challenged in the Supreme Court of the United States, if that tribunal declares that Congress has transgressed its power in its efforts to enact such a law.

If the Senator from Vermont can find a better doctrine of constitutional law anywhere in supreme court reports or even in his own massive and profoundly instructed brain, I shall be interested to hear him declare it. But I must say that if Bacon, Coke, or any other of the great constitutional jurists of England were here, indeed if all were here to focalize upon this question the light of all their great learning in the science of jurisprudence and in reference to free constitutional government, there would not be one I think that could, when considering our form of government, and the careful distribution of its powers, declare that this utterance of the Supreme Court in reference to its rightful authority to declare void an unconstitutional law was not strictly within the powers that they justly possess.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCREERY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the Senator from Alabama concluded?

Mr. MCCREERY. No, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not through with my remarks; but the Senator from Kentucky, finding I was speaking long, has concluded that I could condense my remarks more by postponing them till to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator is too tired to go on, I shall not object to an executive session.

Mr. MORGAN. I fear I have wearied the Senate to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, we have listened to the Senator with great pleasure. If the adjournment is at his request on account of his fatigue, I shall have nothing to say if it be turned into a motion for an executive session; but if it be merely because the Senator from Kentucky is tired, I hope we shall not adjourn.

Mr. MCCREERY. I will change my motion. I am not tired at all. I supposed the Senator from Alabama might be tired, and I wanted to give him an opportunity to rest. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky for the purpose indicated?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to have an entry in the Journal corrected. The Journal states the motion yesterday made by me in reference to excusing the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] from service on the Committee on the Judiciary and providing for the appointment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] somewhat incorrectly. The purpose was simply to provide that the Senator from Iowa should serve during the absence of the Senator from Michigan, instead of which the Journal actually excuses the Senator from Michigan from further service upon the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Journal will be corrected in the respect stated by the Senator from Vermont.

The corrected Journal entry is as follows:

Ordered, That during the absence of Mr. CHRISTIANCY, Mr. ALLISON serve in his stead as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

CHARLES VALIER.

On motion of Mr. OGLESBY, it was Ordered, That the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1210) for the relief of Charles Valier was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have heretofore submitted an amendment from the joint committee on Army reduction and reorganization to the bill (S. No. 1491) to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States, and to make rules for its government and regulation, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a brief substitute, leaving the first eighteen pages of the bill untouched. I move that that amendment be now agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is whether the Senate will take up the bill for consideration for this purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. For what purpose?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For the purpose of submitting this amendment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. For the purpose of making this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The regular order for to-morrow to be the unfinished business when we went into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. It is not important that I should understand about this military bill except just far enough to enable me to vote understandingly. Considering the number of letters which come to me all the time, and of late most of them of loud complaint against what I understand to be the military bill so-called, I feel bound if I can to exert some activity as I go along to keep track of it. Now I do not comprehend at all what this movement means, and I should like to have explained what it is.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will state to the Senator from New York that I was instructed by the joint committee on Army reorganization to move to strike out all after the eighteenth page of the bill and to present the part stricken out to the Senate as a new bill to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The reason for that was that that latter portion contains matter which at this short session of Congress cannot properly be legislated upon or considered. There is too much of it; a great many Senators think so at any rate; and it was deemed wise to move to strike that out. I have offered that part of the bill as a separate measure and had it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand the Senator to say that the part which is to be stricken out he proposes to refer to another committee?

Mr. BURNSIDE. It has been done already, and been referred as a separate bill. Now I ask that the amendment be adopted by the Senate, which will place the first eighteen pages of the bill, without the change of a letter, before the Senate for consideration, the same as the entire bill was before this amendment was adopted.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it not before the Senate now?

Mr. BURNSIDE. It is before the Senate now, but the bill as amended is not before the Senate, and so it comes up for consideration, and I desire to have it come up as amended on a vote, thus avoiding the consideration of the latter part of the bill, which is too bulky, until it is reported from the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. It is simply to avoid reading a bulky bill that I have made this request. The motion that I have made involves the necessity of a change of the title of the bill, also.

Mr. GORDON. I want to suggest to my friend from Rhode Island that probably the simplest and quickest way to dispose of the question would be to recommit the whole bill and let the Military Committee report the substitute in form.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The bill has never been before the Military Committee of the Senate. It is reported from the joint committee on the reorganization of the Army.

Mr. GORDON. I think my friend will save time by the course I suggest, by just recommitting the bill with his amendment to the Military Committee.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Recommit it to them?

Mr. GORDON. Well, refer it to the Military Committee.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It never has been to the Military Committee.

Mr. GORDON. Let it be referred to that committee, and my friend can report it back to-morrow.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It is a bill that was reported from the joint commission on the reorganization of the Army.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator from Rhode Island listen to me for one moment? This bill, I understand the Senator to say, has never been referred to a committee.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It has been reported from a committee—the joint committee on the reorganization of the Army.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was not a committee, but a commission.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator now desires to divide it into two bills.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, if the Senator will make a motion to recommit the whole subject, the committee can report it back in forty bills if they please.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The joint committee on Army reorganization have instructed me to report it back in these two bills; I am doing it at their request. Now I simply ask that the original bill be amended by striking out all after a certain page which is indicated by my amendment. It will not take a minute; I see no harm in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The residue to be treated as the text of a new bill?

Mr. BURNSIDE. All there is of it will be Senate bill No. 1491.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Rhode Island is instructed to report that in two bills, why does he not let the old one lie in peace on the table and make these two reports?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Simply for the reason that the new bill is in the hands of the Military Committee now by the action of the Senate; it has been referred.

Mr. DAWES. Then why not let it rest there as well as on the table?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. DAWES. Let that stay there. If the Senator is instructed by his committee to report two bills in place of that, I do not see any difficulty.

Mr. MAXEY. The original bill as reported from the joint committee covered the subject of the reorganization and reduction of the Army, and also a code of regulations for the Army. Now, the joint committee, through the chairman, the Senator from Rhode Island, proposes to strike out all that portion of the bill which refers to the code of regulations and to the articles of war, and to submit that to the Committee on Military Affairs, thus leaving in the possession of the Senate only so much of the bill as relates to the reorganization and reduction of the Army. That is the simple proposition. The bill, I find, never was before the Committee on Military Affairs, and therefore it ought to be referred to that committee now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to state to the Senator from Rhode Island that if his object is now accomplished of amending this bill on the Calendar by striking off half of it, when it comes up for consideration according to my present views I shall move that it be referred to a committee of this body, the Committee on Military Affairs. The bill came from a joint commission or committee, I do not care what name you call it, made up of a consolidated body of members of the two Houses, and I do not know but of outsiders too. I do not remember how that was.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; only members of the Senate and House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I wish to have a committee of this body consider that bill, be it big or little, and if the Senator does not consent to have it referred now he must take his chances of having it referred by and by.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have no objection to any Senator in this body making any motion he pleases; but I would not pass this bill if I could pass it by asking any one Senator here to vote for it. It has not been a pleasant duty for me to report this bill. I now simply ask that I may have the necessary aid in getting the bill before the Senate for consideration. I think that is only fair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is fair; and the best way to do it, as the Senator wishes to amend the bill by taking out half of it or more, is to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which he is a member, that can report it to-morrow if it wishes, stripped down to just the barest bones that the committee like.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am acting under the instructions of the committee for the reorganization of the Army. That was a committee organized by a joint resolution, and I shall not at any suggestion of the Senator from Vermont—I do not mean any disrespect—or any other Senator disobey the instructions of that committee. If the Senate chooses to allow me to make this motion and permits this bill to be amended, and then the Senator from Vermont or the Senator from New York or any other Senator chooses to move the reference of it to the Military Committee, he will not find me opposing the wish of the Senate in that regard. I am now obeying the instructions of the joint committee on the reorganization of the Army, and I am subordinate to that committee and doing exactly as I am told to do. I ask to put it to the Senate to allow me to do just what I ask leave to do, and then if they want to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs I have no objection, and I shall not oppose the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The difference between the Senator from Rhode Island and the rest of us is that he is under orders from the joint committee and bound to do it and we are not.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not ask you to do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And, therefore, what binds him does not bind the rest of us. We think, or certainly the Senator from Georgia stated, and I agree with him entirely, that the correct disposition of this bill, as it is not in the condition that the joint committee itself wishes to have it acted upon now, would be to refer it to our own Committee on Military Affairs; and, if the Senator says he is not going to object to such a motion, I will make that motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that the request which my colleague makes is one that I never saw refused in this body. He has presented a bill, and he asks to amend it by leaving out a portion of it, striking out a portion of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be the very part that the rest of us want.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then the rest of us can move to put it in again; but a man who has charge of a bill is always allowed to amend it by striking out.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Rhode Island if this is anything more in substance than a request on the part of his colleague to be permitted to modify this report? That is all there is of it.

Mr. BLAINE. That is all there is of it; merely modifying a report.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is all; and I never knew such a request refused.

Mr. HOAR. He makes a report from the commission, and he says the commission, finding that a large part of the subject-matter cannot be considered in the short session, ask to be permitted to modify their report by changing a part of it and leaving the rest. That is the whole of it. The question is whether that is not a courtesy due to an organ which the Senate has itself created.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state his understanding of the situation. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] has asked unanimous consent that this bill be taken up temporarily for the purpose of submitting an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard that request, and the bill is now before the Senate. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to amend the bill by striking out the portion indicated by him.

Mr. MAXEY. I have all along believed that this bill, before the Senate acts on it, should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The reply which is made by the Senator from Rhode Island does not answer the question. This body has not the opinion or matured judgment of its own committee upon that bill. While it is true that it came from a joint committee, it was not the committee appointed by this body to consider such bills; and my belief is, and always has been, that the bill ought to be committed to the Committee on Military Affairs. I submitted that question to the very superior judgment on parliamentary rules of the Senator from Rhode Island. He differed with me, taking the position that, coming from a joint committee, it did not have to go to the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not understand the rules, and do not pretend to comprehend them; but according to reason the Military Committee of this body was organized for the purpose of giving to the Senate its matured judgment upon matters pertaining to military affairs, and therefore it seems to me that this body ought to have the opinion of that committee upon this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am opposed to this simply because I am called upon to join the Senate in an act striking out something that I know nothing about in the world. Now, I am not in the habit in this body of acting and voting upon a proposition that I know nothing about at all. If this motion be made and insisted upon that this Senate shall by its record action strike out portions of that bill that I know nothing about in the world and that nine out of every ten of the Senators may be opposed to striking out, and we are to stand committed to that record, I propose to have it read in full and then I shall know whether I will consent to striking it out or not.

I understand the object of the Senator from Rhode Island; but he wants us to say that we will strike this part out. Now if he wants to divide this portion of the report, I have no objection to giving unanimous consent to its withdrawal, but I will not give the consent of the Senate to act upon it until it is read, and that is my privilege and right.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is precisely the same thing. Then let the Senator withdraw that portion of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator modify his motion?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask leave to withdraw that part of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island modifies his proposition so that now he asks unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw certain portions of the bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the consent is given.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 30, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., Mr. SAYLER in the chair as Speaker pro tempore. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR DECEASED MEMBERS.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I ask unanimous consent that Saturday the 15th of February, at two o'clock, be set apart for addresses in memory of the late Gustave Schleicher, of Texas.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. And I ask unanimous consent that Monday the 3d of February, at three o'clock, be set apart for like services in memory of the late Terrence J. Quinn, of New York.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COOK. I ask that Tuesday, February 11, at half past three o'clock, be set apart for similar services in memory of the late Julian Hartridge, of Georgia.

Mr. COX, of New York. Before that order is made I would like to ask a question of the Chair. The census bill is fixed as a special order for that day, after the reading of the Journal. Can the next day be fixed for that purpose?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. ATKINS. Subject to appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not know how the original order was worded.

Mr. ATKINS. That was the order before.

Mr. COX, of New York. Of course, subject to appropriation bills, as the original order was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The change will be made if there is no objection.

There being no objection, Tuesday, February 11, at half past three o'clock, was set apart for services in memory of the late Julian Hartridge, and the census bill was made the special order for the next day, after the reading of the Journal, subject to appropriation bills.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolutions of the house of representatives of the Ohio Legislature; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Resolved, That the thanks of this house are hereby tendered to the Congress of the United States for passing, and to the President for approving, the arrears of pensions bill.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and to the President of the United States.

JAMES E. NEAL,
Speaker of the House.
L. A. BRUNNER,
Clerk of the House.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. FULLER. I ask unanimous consent that the order be now made that on Wednesday next at half past four o'clock the House shall take a recess until seven and a half o'clock p. m., and that the evening session shall be for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALE. Subject of course to any business of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDEN. There is to be a night session Tuesday night of next week. If we have one the next night we will be crowding things, will we not?

Mr. ATKINS. I shall have to object. There are four large appropriation bills not yet considered by the House. I cannot consent to any more special orders until we get farther along with the appropriation bills. [After a pause.] I will have no objection to the proposition if it is made subject to the consideration of appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is what the Chair understood to be the proposition.

Mr. FULLER. That is my proposition.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I have no objection.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6256) to secure from loss the depositors in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the House will now resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6143) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. Before the Clerk proceeds, I would inquire if the regular order is not the morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The regular order is the post-office appropriation bill, coming over from yesterday under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. HOOKER. Then I desire to give notice to the House that when this bill shall have been disposed of I shall insist upon a morning hour, in order that we may proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business in the morning hour.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. We will assist you in that.

The Clerk read the pending amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, which was, in lines 71 and 72, page 4 of the bill, to strike out "$1,075,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,125,000;" so that the clause will read:

For route agents, $1,125,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. On that amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the yeas and nays. The House has already intimated very clearly its purpose in regard to these amendments.

Mr. BLOUNT. I insist upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 103, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—125.

So the amendment was concurred in.

During the vote,

Mr. STENGER said: I am paired on this question with my colleague, Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If present, he would vote in the affirmative and I would vote in the negative.

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague, Mr. GOODE, is confined to his room by indisposition.

Mr. HARTZELL. I am paired with Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas.

Mr. SHELLEY. My colleague, Mr. FORNEY, is absent by order of the House.

Mr. CALKINS. I am paired with Mr. FINLEY, of Ohio. If he were present, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. TUCKER. I am paired with Mr. LAPHAM, of New York.

Mr. LANDERS. Mr. BALLOU is paired with Mr. HENRY.

Mr. HAZELTON. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. LYNDE, who is absent by order of the House. If he were present, I would vote "ay" and he would vote "no."

Mr. FOSTER. I am paired with Mr. BLACKBURN. If he were present, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. CLYMER. If he were present, I would vote "ay."

Mr. HASKELL. I am paired with Mr. KNOTT, of Kentucky.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. CARLISLE is paired with Mr. KEIFER, of Ohio.

On motion of Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 85 add the following:

If said stamps can be furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury at less than the same now cost, the work of furnishing the same shall be given to said bureau when not in violation of existing contracts.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BLOUNT. It was the understanding, Mr. Speaker, yesterday the footings should be made in accordance with the amendments adopted. I therefore move the following:

In lines 3, 4, and 5, section 2 of the bill, strike out "$4,296,319.10" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,250,250.10;" so it will read:

SEC. 2. That if the revenue of the Post-Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, then the sum of $5,250,250.10, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the revenue of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1880.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is in accordance, the Chair understands, with the agreement.

There was no objection, and the amendment was received and adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BLOUNT demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now move, Mr. Speaker, that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up and considering the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BANNING. I wish to call attention of the gentleman from New York for a moment——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio if he wishes to make an explanation. I do not know what his purpose is.

Mr. BANNING. I wish to state to the gentleman from New York that the bill to reorganize the Army, agreed to unanimously by the joint committee, stands to be taken up immediately after the morning hour. Before he proceeds to the Army appropriation bill I ask that we shall be permitted to take up the bill for the reorganization of the Army and have it considered, so legislation concerning the Army shall not be put on an appropriation bill, but shall be considered and acted on in a separate proposition.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio a question if the gentleman from New York will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. CALKINS. Is it the purpose of the Committee on Military Affairs to have this Army bill considered by the House before the appropriation bill for the Army?

Mr. BANNING. That is the purpose I have in view. The bill for the reorganization of the Army has been made the special order in the House, and we think it ought to be considered before the bill making appropriations for the Army.

Mr. CALKINS. That is precisely what I think.

Mr. BANNING. Therefore, if the gentleman from New York will permit me, I will move the House proceed to the consideration of the bill for the reorganization of the Army.

Mr. HOOKER. After the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That cannot be done, because the bill referred to by the gentleman from Ohio is the special order only after the morning hour, and the regular order of business, if the motion of the gentleman from New York is withdrawn, would be the demand for the morning hour. The bill of the gentleman from Ohio cannot be reached until the close of the morning hour. Besides that, at two o'clock the District of Columbia business has control of the floor.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It was for that reason I was quite willing the motion of the gentleman from Ohio should prevail, or rather unanimous consent should be given to it, because there is an interval of an hour during which this bill could be disposed of, and the disposition of that bill by the House would greatly simplify the work of the Committee on Appropriations in reference to the Army appropriation bill. I trust the House will give unanimous consent. It is only a question of time whether it should come before or after the morning hour. It seems to me it will be the wisest thing to do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the House. Is there objection to proceeding to the consideration of the bill for the reorganization of the Army?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object. [Cries of "Order!"] I object to all measures for harassing the Army. We ought not to harass the Army. Sitting Bull will come soon; it should be left to him to harass our brave boys. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. It is a brief bill and will not take much time.

Mr. HOOKER. I raise the point of order against the proposition that the morning hour is first in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is pending before the House a privileged motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] which must first be disposed of.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman to give way for a motion to suspend the rules to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the reorganization of the Army.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion would not be in order to-day.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I yield for a moment to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] to introduce a bill.

SIGNAL STATION ON DELAWARE BREAKWATER.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6257) to establish and maintain a signal station on the breakwater, Lewes, Delaware; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAYES and others called for the regular order.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I rise to a question of order. I remember that a week ago the bill (H. R. No. 2240) was made a special order for to-day. I desire to ask the Chair whether it was not fixed to come up immediately after the reading of the Journal.

A MEMBER. What bill is that?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. A bill to amend sections 1417, 1418, 1419, 1420, and 1624 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Navy of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the journal clerk that the bill referred to was made a special order for to-day after the morning hour and not after the reading of the Journal.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Did I not understand the Chair to say a few moments ago that the regular order after the post-office appropriation bill should be disposed of would be the morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the regular order; but a motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider one of the regular appropriation bills is a privileged motion; it is a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOOKER. But the House may reject it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly. The motion of the gentleman from New York must be first submitted; and unless the House by a majority vote determine to go into Committee of the Whole, then of course the business of the morning hour will come up.

Mr. BANNING. If the motion of the gentleman from New York should prevail, may he not then give way for the consideration of the bill to reorganize the Army?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands, he cannot.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, informed the House that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 6141) making appropriations to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of section 254 of the Revised Statutes, and to appropriate $40,000 for the miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 613) subjecting the Fort Wayne military reservation, in the State of Arkansas, to entry as other public lands in said State; and

An act (H. R. No. 4200) relating to the national road in the State of Maryland, and to give consent of the United States to a certain act of the General Assembly of Maryland in relation to said road.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DANFORD. Will the Chair please state what is the pending question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending question is the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I make the point that the House cannot be asked to suspend the rules on this day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the gentleman from New York that the House may at any time, by a majority vote, suspend the rules for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair directs Rule 104 to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

104. The House may at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HENDEE. At two o'clock the Committee for the District of Columbia are entitled to the floor. I desire to inquire whether if the House is in Committee of the Whole at that hour the committee will rise by the action of the Chairman or whether it will be a question for the committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will rise by the action of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. At two o'clock it will be his duty to leave the chair and it will be taken by the Speaker pro tempore. The rights of the Committee for the District of Columbia will be protected.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, there were—ayes 81, noes 87.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of New York, and Mr. HOOKER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 101.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 123, not voting 52; as follows:

Mr. HARTZELL. I am paired with the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. PHILLIPS.

Mr. ACKLEN. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CLYMER, on this question.

Mr. MAJORS. I am paired with the gentleman from Texas, Mr. CULBERSON.

Mr. HASKELL. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. KNOTT.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I change my vote. I voted in the negative.

Mr. METCALFE. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BLAND.

Mr. OLIVER. I desire to announce that Mr. CARLISLE is paired with Mr. KEIFER.

Mr. HENKLE. I desire to announce that upon all political questions my colleague, Mr. HENRY, is paired with Mr. BALLOU.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. My colleague, Mr. HAZELTON, is paired with Mr. LYNDE. If here, he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. HOOKER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 63 members voting therefor.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and had reached the name of Mr. LANDERS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (interrupting the roll-call.) The Chair is compelled to interfere with the further calling of the roll under a special order of the House, which will now be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, ordered that on Thursday, January 30, after two o'clock p. m., the remainder of the session of that day be devoted exclusively to the consideration of reports from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under this order the Committee for the District of Columbia is entitled to the floor, and the Chair recognizes the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was decided the other day by the Speaker—it is of no consequence in the world in this case except as a question of the rules—that nothing can interrupt the roll-call, except a final adjournment of Congress. The roll was being called, and the House had ordered that a recess should be taken, and the Speaker decided that the roll-call must be finished.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think that was the decision of the Speaker, but he is upon the floor and can answer for himself.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The Chair made no such decision. If the gentleman will hear read the remarks made by the Speaker on that occasion he will see that he is mistaken.

Mr. GARFIELD. I may have misunderstood the decision of the Chair, but that was my impression.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The gentleman will know better what the decision of the Chair was after hearing it read the second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. My understanding was that it was the order of the House to take a recess at half past four o'clock. The roll was being called upon a motion for the adjournment, and the question was whether the roll-call should not be completed, even though it took a longer time than was fixed for the recess. The Speaker decided that the roll-call must continue, the yeas and nays having been ordered by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have read the decision of the Speaker on that occasion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BUNDY (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) moved that the House adjourn; on which motion the yeas and nays were ordered, one-fifth of the members present voting in favor thereof.

During the calling of the roll on said motion, Mr. CONGER made the point of order that the House having previously ordered that a recess should be taken at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. until seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., and the latter hour having arrived, the previous order of the House must now be executed.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order on the ground that the motion to adjourn was the only one by which the House would have the opportunity to change its mind except the motion to reconsider the vote by which the recess was ordered, which motion was now precluded by the motion to adjourn. If the roll-call was upon a motion relating to the pending bill, it would be the duty of the Chair to execute the order of the House at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. by declaring the House to be in recess until seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The Chair still adheres to that opinion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the Chair was correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is reason why a vote upon a motion to adjourn should not be interrupted, because it is the privilege of the House to adjourn at any time.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) If the House were acting upon any question on the pending bill, then the order for a recess would interrupt it immediately at the time at which the recess was fixed should arrive.

HENRY C. DE AHNA.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, submitted a report in writing upon the petition of Henry C. De Ahna; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

LICENSES IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CLAFLIN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 4466, a bill (H. R. No. 6258) imposing a license on trade, business, and professions practiced or carried on in the District of Columbia, and providing for the enforcement and collection of fines and penalties for carrying on business in the said District without license, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON EYE, EAR, AND THROAT HOSPITAL.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3089, a bill (H. R. No. 6259) to incorporate the Washington Eye, Ear, and Throat Hospital; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That William A. Maury, William H. Morrison, John A. Baker, Wright Rives, Daniel B. Clarke, William M. Galt, Johnson Elliot, doctor of medicine, Samuel C. Busey, doctor of medicine, John C. Riley, doctor of medicine, Alexander Y. P. Garnett, doctor of medicine, Louis Mackall, doctor of medicine, Noble Young, doctor of medicine, and two members of the House of Representatives and one member of the Senate of the United States, to be appointed respectively by the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate, and their successors duly chosen, are hereby constituted a body-corporate in the District of Columbia, by the name of the Washington Eye, Ear, and Throat Hospital, to be used as a hospital and dispensary for the gratuitous treatment of the medical and surgical diseases of the eye, ear, and throat: Provided, however, That the board of trustees may permit the admission of patients able and willing to defray the expenses of such treatment.

SEC. 2. That said corporation shall consist of fifteen members, constituting a board of trustees, six of whom shall be regular practitioners of medicine and members of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, two members of the House of Representatives, and one member of the Senate of the United States, to be appointed as specified in section 1, and six laymen, citizens of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That the fifteen corporators named in section 1 shall constitute the first board of trustees. Said board, exclusive of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, shall be divided into six classes, consisting of one physician and one layman. The time of service of each class shall be for five years: Provided, That the service of the first class shall terminate on the first Monday of December, 1880, and the other classes, in numerical succession, in 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885. The five physician members shall constitute the consulting medical board of the hospital and dispensary.

SEC. 4. That vacancies occurring in the board of trustees by death, resignation, or expiration of term of office, except in the case of members of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall be filled by a vote of the contributing members of the institution.

SEC. 5. That any person who may pay into the Treasury on or before the first Monday in December, annually, the sum of $5 in lawful currency, shall become a contributing member of the institution, and entitled to one vote, either in person or by proxy, at the election of trustees. No one shall be a trustee who is not a contributing member.

SEC. 6. That the board of trustees shall make all necessary rules and regulations for the government of the hospital, shall have power to provide suitable buildings and all necessary appliances for the hospital, and make and carry into effect all necessary arrangements for the support of the same. The officers of the board shall be a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer.

SEC. 7. That the board of trustees shall elect two attending physicians, who shall be regular practitioners and members of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, and skilled in the treatment of diseases of the eye, ear, and throat, who shall not be removed except for cause, after regular trial on charges duly prepared, with the right to said physicians to introduce testimony and be read in their defense thereon, and only upon the concurrence of two-thirds of said board. The attending physicians shall have the privilege of attending meetings of the board, but shall not vote upon any question.

SEC. 8. That said corporation shall have power to accept, purchase, receive conveyances of, and hold property, either personal or real, to any amount necessary for the full accommodation, convenience, and support of the institution, and those participating in its benefits.

SEC. 9. That the property, personal or real, so held by said corporation, shall be exempt from taxes and assessments levied under act of Congress or by authority of any municipal corporation or board within the District of Columbia.

SEC. 10. That Congress may at any time hereafter alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. HUNTON. The bill under consideration is merely to incorporate the Eye, Ear, and Throat Hospital of the city of Washington. It contains no appropriation; and unless some gentleman desires to speak upon it I will call for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REAL-ESTATE TITLES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HUNTON also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 4950) to quiet title to real estate in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever any person or persons shall have held any real estate in the District of Columbia by exclusive adverse possession for twenty years or upward by him or them, or those under whom he or they claim, such person or persons may file a bill in equity in the proper court of said District against all persons claiming, or who may claim, an interest therein, as the persons last seized thereof prior to the commencement of such adverse possession, or the heirs, devisees, or representatives of such persons last seized, and any and all parties in interest, so far as the same may be known to the complainant or complainants in such bill in equity; and if no parties are known to the complainant or complainants proper to be made defendants on account of their interest, or claim of interest, then such complainant or complainants may file a bill in the nature of proceedings in rem against the property itself; and thereupon such proceedings shall be had as are usual in equity causes. And if it shall appear by proper evidence that the complainant or complainants have been in such exclusive adverse possession for twenty years or upward before the filing of the bill, then such decree shall be rendered in favor of the complainant or complainants as shall assure to him or them such title in the premises as the first grantee had therein.

SEC. 2. That the adverse possession mentioned in the foregoing section may be either actual or constructive; and payment of taxes on such property by the complainant and those under whom he holds for such period of twenty years or upward shall be deemed constructive possession.

SEC. 3. That upon the filing of any such bill as hereinbefore mentioned notice of publication shall be inserted in such newspaper in the city of Washington as may be designated by the court, notifying all parties in interest to appear and defend the suit, and specifying in such notice the real estate in which it is proposed to perfect the title of the complainant or complainants. And personal service, also, shall be had, as in other cases, upon such interested parties as may be within the jurisdiction of the court, and a copy of the notice of publication shall be transmitted by mail to the address of such interested parties outside of the jurisdiction of the court whose address may be known. And proper proof of such notice of publication, and of such personal service, and of such transmission of notice, as the case may require, shall be essential to give the court jurisdiction.

SEC. 4. That appeals may be had in such cases as in other suits in equity.

SEC. 5. That any person claiming an interest in the premises may, at any time within the period of one year from and after the date of the rendition of the decree in any such cause, intervene therein, upon reasonable cause shown, and have such decree reopened, and be allowed to defend his interests in the premises.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENKLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MOUNT PLEASANT AND POTOMAC SIDE RAILWAY.

Mr. HENKLE also, from the same committee, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 5370) to incorporate the Mount Pleasant and Potomac Side Railway Company.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That S. P. Brown, William Dickson, Lysander Hill, George P. Goff, and John W. Bell, and their associates and assigns, be, and they are hereby, created a body-corporate, under the name of the Mount Pleasant and Potomac Side Railway Company, with authority to construct and lay down a single or double track railway, with the necessary switches and turnouts, in the city and county of Washington, District of Columbia, through and along the following streets and avenues: Commencing at Boundary and Sixteenth streets, and running thence due south along said Sixteenth street to its intersection with H street northwest, thence east along H street northwest to Fourteenth street, thence south along Fourteenth street to B street southwest, thence east along B street southwest to Twelfth street southwest, thence south along Twelfth street to its intersection with Water street, thence along said Water street to the Sixth street steamboat landing, with the right to run public carriages thereon, drawn by horse-power, receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding five cents a passenger for any distance on said road, from its beginning to its terminus on Water street: Provided, That wherever the foregoing route may coincide with the route of any other duly incorporated street railway company in the District of Columbia, or connect portions of such route, but one set of tracks shall be used by both companies, which are hereby authorized and empowered to use such tracks in common, upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon by said companies; and in the event the said companies fail to agree upon satisfactory terms, either of said companies may apply by petition to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall provide for proper notice to and hearing of all parties interested, and shall have power to determine the terms and conditions upon which, and the regulations under which the company hereby incorporated shall be entitled so to use and enjoy the track of such other street railway company, and the amount and manner of compensation to be paid therefor: And provided further, That neither of the companies using such track in common shall be permitted to make the track so used in common the depot or general stopping-place to await passengers, but shall only be entitled to use the same for the ordinary passage of their cars, with the ordinary halts for the taking-up and dropping of passengers.

SEC. 2. That the road of said company, with all its property and franchises, shall be liable to taxation as is or may be provided by law, and their cars or vehicles shall be subject to the provisions of such laws as to license and fees therefor.

SEC. 3. That the said railway shall be laid as near the center of the streets and avenues in the city of Washington as practicable, (without interfering with or passing over the water or gas pipes,) in the most approved manner adapted to street railways, with rails of the most approved pattern, with a flat bearing for street vehicles, exclusive of the car-wheel bearing, similar to that used by the Washington and Georgetown Railway Company, laid upon an even surface with the pavements of the streets and avenues; and the space between the two tracks (where two are laid) shall not be less than four feet nor more than six feet in width, and the carriages shall not be less than six feet in width, the gauge to correspond with that of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway.

SEC. 4. That the said corporation hereby created shall be bound to keep said tracks and a space of two feet beyond the outer rails thereof, and also the space between the tracks, at all times well paved and in good order, in such manner and with such material as may be directed by the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia; and if there be at any time no such board, then by the Secretary of War, without expense to the United States or the said city. That when any street or avenue through which the said railroad runs shall be paved, said railroad company shall bear all the expenses for that portion of the work lying between the exterior rails of the tracks of said road, and for a distance of two feet from and exterior to such track or tracks on each side thereof, and of keeping the same in repair; but the said railway company, having conformed to the grades established by the commissioners, may use such cobble-stone or Belgian blocks for paving their tracks or the spaces between their tracks as the commissioners may direct.

SEC. 5. That nothing in this act shall prevent the government or the proper authorities of the District of Columbia, at any time, at its option, from altering the grade, or otherwise improving all avenues and streets occupied by said road, or the said District from so altering and improving such streets and avenues, and the sewerage thereof, as may be under their respective authority and control; and in such event it shall be the duty of said company, at its own expense, to change its said railway so as to conform to such grade and pavement.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize said body-corporate to issue any note, token or device, scrip, or other evidence of debt, to be used as currency; but it may issue interest-bearing bonds of such denominations and running for such length of time or times as the stockholders may direct, to an amount not exceeding the sum of $100,000.

SEC. 7. That the capital stock of said company shall not be less than $100,000 nor more than $400,000; and that the stock shall be divided into shares of $50 each, and shall be deemed personal property, transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company may direct.

SEC. 8. That the said company shall place first-class cars on said railway, with all the modern improvements, for the convenience and comfort of passengers, and shall run cars thereon during the day and as late at night as eleven o'clock, and as often as every ten minutes.

SEC. 9. That the said company shall provide such passenger-rooms, offices, stables, and depots at such points as the business of the road and the convenience of the public may require; and said company is hereby authorized to lay such rails through transverse streets or avenues as may be necessary, not exceeding one block in distance in any one place, for connecting the said stables, depots, and offices with the main tracks; and the said company is hereby authorized to purchase or lease such lands or buildings as may be necessary for the passenger-rooms, ticket-office, stables, and depots above named, and not to exceed $200,000 in value.

SEC. 10. That all articles of value that may be left in any of the cars or other vehicles of said company shall be taken to its principal depot and entered in a book of record of unclaimed goods; which book shall be open to the inspection of the public at all reasonable hours.

SEC. 11. That within thirty days after the passage and approval of this act, the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, or if any refuse to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause books of subscription to the capital stock of said company to be opened and kept open in some convenient and accessible place or places in the city of Washington, for a period to be fixed by said corporators, not less than two days; and said corporators shall give public notice by advertisement in not less than two daily papers published in the city of Washington of the time when and place where said books shall be opened, and subscribers on said books to the capital stock of the company shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That no one individual shall be allowed to subscribe for more than two hundred shares of said stock: Provided further, That every subscriber shall pay at the time of subscribing 5 per cent. of the amount by him subscribed to the treasurer of said company, or his subscription shall be null and void; and said payment shall in no case be withdrawn or loaned to any member of said company. And when the books of subscription to the capital stock of said company shall be closed, the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall, within ten days thereafter, call the first meeting of the stockholders of said company, to meet within ten days thereafter, for the choice of seven directors, of which public notice shall be given for three days in not less than two newspapers published daily in the city of Washington, or by written or printed personal notice to each stockholder by the secretary or clerk of the said corporation. And in all meetings of the stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 12. That the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in a board of directors, seven in number, who shall be stockholders, and who shall hold their office for one year, or until others are duly elected and qualified to take their places as directors. And the said directors (a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum) shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, and who shall also be president of the company; and they shall also choose a treasurer, who shall be a stockholder, and who shall give bonds, with security, to said company, in such sum as the said directors may require, for the faithful discharge of his trust; and said board shall also elect a secretary, who shall also be a stockholder, and who shall perform such duties as usually pertain to said office. In case of a vacancy in the board of directors, by death, resignation, or otherwise, of any director, the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the remaining directors.

SEC. 13. That the directors shall have full power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper respecting the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company, not contrary to the charter or the laws of the United States or of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the directors of said company shall have power to require the subscribers to the capital stock to pay the amount by them respectively subscribed at such time (after the first installment) and in such manner and amounts as they may deem proper; and if any stockholder shall refuse or neglect to pay any installment as required by a resolution of the board of directors, after reasonable notice of the same, the said board of directors may sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, so many shares of his said stock as shall pay said installment, (and the highest bidder shall be taken to be the person who offers to purchase the least number of shares for the assessment due,) under such general regulations as may be adopted in the by-laws of said company; or said body-corporate may sue and collect the same from any delinquent subscriber in any court of competent jurisdiction; and no part of the capital paid in shall at any time be withdrawn by said company or any member thereof.

SEC. 14. That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders for choice of directors, to be holden at such time and place, under such conditions, and upon such notice as the said company in their by-laws may prescribe; and said directors shall annually make a report of their doings to the stockholders in general meeting.

SEC. 15. That if any person or persons shall willfully and unnecessarily obstruct or impede the passage of the cars of said railway, or destroy or injure the cars, depots, stations, or other property belonging to said railway, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense the sum of $10 to said company, to be recovered and disposed of as other fines and penalties in said District, and shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his, her, or their act as aforesaid; but no suit shall be brought unless commenced within sixty days after such offense shall have been committed.

SEC. 16. That unless said corporation shall commence to lay the said track within four months and complete their said railway within eighteen months from and after the passage of this act, then this act shall be null and void, and no rights whatever shall be acquired under it.

SEC. 17. And the said company is hereby authorized and empowered to construct an extension to said route on and along the following streets and roads within the city and county of Washington, to wit: Commencing at Sixteenth and Boundary streets, and running east on Boundary to Fourteenth street; thence north along the Fourteenth street road to its junction with Park street at Mount Pleasant: Provided, That the Mount Pleasant Railroad Company of the District of Columbia do not construct a railroad along the streets and roads above named before September 1, 1879, in accordance with a charter granted by act of Congress; And, provided, That said extension is commenced within one year and completed within two years from and after the passage of this act. And the said company may charge additional fare, not exceeding two cents, for any distance on said extension.

SEC. 18. That no person shall be prohibited the right to travel on any part of said road, or ejected from the cars thereof, for any other cause than that of being drunk, disorderly, unclean, contagiously diseased, refusing to pay the legal fare exacted, or to comply with the lawful general regulations of the company.

SEC. 19. That each of the stockholders in the said railway company shall be liable individually for all the debts and liabilities of the said company to an amount equal to the amount of stock held by such stockholder.

SEC. 20. That said company shall make such reports of expenditures, earnings, and otherwise, to the authorities of the Government, as may be required by law.

SEC. 21. That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

The amendments reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia were agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PRICE. I noticed, while listening to the bill as it was read, that section 13 provides for the forfeiting of the stock upon the non-payment of installments, "after reasonable notice." I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that in place of the word "reasonable" there be inserted a certain number of days, say "thirty days."

Mr. HENKLE. If the gentleman will prepare an amendment to that effect I will have no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Then I move to strike out the word "reasonable" and insert "thirty days;" so that portion of the section will read as follows:

Provided, That the directors of said company shall have power to require the subscribers to the capital stock to pay the amount by them respectively subscribed at such time (after the first installment) and in such manner and amounts as they may deem proper; and if any stockholder shall refuse or neglect to pay any installment as required by a resolution of the board of directors, after thirty days' notice of the same, the said board of directors may sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, so many shares of his said stock as shall pay said installment, (and the highest bidder shall be taken to be the person who offers to purchase the least number of shares for the assessment due,) under such general regulations as may be adopted in the by-laws of said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENKLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS FOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. DAVIS, of California, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6260) for the collection of the special assessments for the improvements of the streets about the Capitol, and to amend the act of March 3, 1873; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

GOVERNMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAYHAM, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6261) supplemental to an act entitled "An act providing for a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia," approved June 11, 1878; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

DESCENTS AND INHERITANCE.

Mr. BOUCK, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 1028) declaratory of the law relating to descents and inheritance in the District of Columbia in certain cases.

The bill was read. It provides that the issue of any marriage of colored persons, contracted and entered into according to any custom prevailing at the time in any of the States wherein the same occurred, shall, for all purposes of descent and inheritance and the transmission of both real and personal property within the District of Columbia, be deemed and held to be legitimate, and capable of inheriting and transmitting inheritance, and taken as next of kin and distributee according to law, from and to their parents, or either of them, and from and to those from whom such parents, or either of them, may inherit or transmit inheritance, anything in the laws of such State to the contrary notwithstanding. But nothing herein is to be construed as implying that any such marriage is not valid, or such issue legitimate for all purposes.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. BOUCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT TAXES AND TAX SALES.

Mr. HENDEE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 1344) relating to tax sales and taxes in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read. It provides that it shall be the duty of the collector of taxes for the District of Columbia to prepare and keep in his office, for public inspection, a list of lots and squares, arranged in numerical order, of all real estate in the city of Washington heretofore sold, or which may hereafter be sold, for the non-payment of any general or special tax or assessment levied or assessed upon the same; said list to show the date of sale and for what taxes sold, in whose name assessed at the time of sale, the amount for which the same was sold, when and to whom conveyed if deeded, or, if redeemed from said sale, the date of redemption. And it is made the duty of the collector, whenever called upon, to furnish, in addition to the regular tax bills, a certified statement, over his hand and official seal, of all taxes and assessments, general and special, that may be due and unpaid at the time of making such certificate, and which may in any manner be a lien upon any real estate located in the District; and for each and every certificate so furnished by the collector the party requesting the same shall pay into the treasury of the District a fee of fifty cents; and this certificate, when furnished as aforesaid, shall be a bar to the collection and recovery from any subsequent purchaser of any tax or assessment omitted from and which may be a lien upon the real estate mentioned in the certificate; and such lien shall be discharged as to such subsequent purchaser, but shall not affect the liability of the person who owned the property at the time such tax was assessed to pay the same. It is declared that all public records which have any reference or in any way relate to real or personal property in the District shall be open to the public for inspection free of charge.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DAMAGES TO REAL ESTATE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HENDEE also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1973, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 228) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to receive and report upon unadjusted claims for damage to real estate in the District of Columbia.

The joint resolution was read. It recites in the preamble that by the provisions of an act approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act to provide a government for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," and also of joint resolution approved December 21, 1874, a board of audit was constituted to examine and audit for settlement claims for damage to real estate in the District of Columbia, sustained by reason of public improvements or repairs; that the said board of audit examined and settled a number of such claims; that a joint resolution of Congress of March 14, 1876, abolished said board before it had completed the auditing and settlement of such claims; and that other claims for damage to real property, by reason of public improvements or repairs, have arisen since June 20, 1874, which were not cognizable by said board of audit. The bill therefore authorizes and directs the commissioners of the District of Columbia to give public notice for ten days in two newspapers published in the District for all persons having unadjusted claims for damage to real estate by reason of public improvements or repairs in the District that have not heretofore been presented for settlement to the late board of public works or board of audit of the District, or, if presented, were not adjudicated upon their merits, to present the same, with the proof of such damage, under oath, to the commissioners of the District before the 1st day of October, A. D., 1879; and the commissioners shall thereupon examine such claims, taking into consideration any special advantages or benefits the property damaged may derive from such improvements or repairs, and determine the amount that such real estate so damaged may be equitably entitled to receive, and shall make a tabulated report of the same to Congress on the first Monday of December, A. D., 1879, together with such recommendations for their settlement as may seem to them best in the premises; and it is declared that no claim which shall not have been presented as above authorized before the 1st day of October, 1879, shall hereafter be considered, but that any neglect to so present such claim before that date shall be taken and construed as a perpetual bar to the prosecution thereof before any tribunal hereafter.

Mr. LATHROP. I move to amend by adding to this resolution the following:

Provided, That the passage of this resolution shall not be deemed or taken as in any manner committing the United States to the payment of such claims or any of them, nor as a recognition of their justice or legality.

Mr. HENDEE. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HENDEE.] If I have heard the provisions of this joint resolution correctly, it simply provides that the claimants shall file their affidavits before the commissioners.

Mr. HENDEE. It provides for filing the claims and affidavits, and for a report to be made to Congress.

Mr. EDEN. Consequently, whatever evidence there may be in reference to these claims will be purely and entirely ex parte. I do not think that sort of testimony will be worth very much.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is that all the testimony the commissioners will be authorized to take?

Mr. HENDEE. Certainly not; by this resolution they are authorized to examine into the merits of the claims.

Mr. EDEN. I do not see anywhere in the resolution anything authorizing the commissioners to take any testimony at all. The commissioners of the District of Columbia have no judicial functions unless we confer them. This joint resolution simply authorizes these commissioners to receive the claims that may be filed, with the affidavits of the claimants, and then to examine the claims. They can only examine them by examining the accounts filed and the affidavits of the claimants, unless we give them some further power.

Mr. HENDEE. The words of the joint resolution are, "with the proof of such damage, under oath."

Mr. EDEN. The proof by the claimant—that is, his affidavit.

Mr. HENDEE. These claims are simply to be reported to the next Congress.

Mr. EDEN. Certainly. The only reason I make the suggestion is that if this labor of the commissioners is to be of any value at all it seems to me they ought to have power to take testimony on behalf of the Government; they ought to have the means of making some further investigation than simply taking the affidavit of the claimants.

Mr. HENDEE. Would it be satisfactory to the gentleman to add a word or two after the word "claims" in the sixteenth line, as follows: "and the said commissioners of the District of Columbia shall thereupon examine such claims, taking such testimony as they may see fit."

Mr. EDEN. That would help it.

Mr. BUCKNER. They should have power to take testimony.

Mr. HENDEE. Add the words "with power to take testimony" after the word "claims," sixteenth line.

Mr. EDEN. I do not know whether these commissioners have the power to administer oaths or not.

Mr. HENDEE. I do not know, but I think they have.

Mr. EDEN. Somebody should have power to administer oaths.

Mr. HENDEE. Add the words "with power to take testimony and administer oaths."

Mr. LATHROP's amendment was adopted; and then the amendment of Mr. HENDEE was agreed to.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MOUNT PLEASANT RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HENDEE also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 6175) to incorporate the Mount Pleasant Railroad Company, with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That William H. Beck, William Orme, Lyman S. Emery, George W. Riggs, Gilbert Vanderwerken, John T. Lenman, J. S. Brown, William R. And the track herein authorized shall be four feet eight and one-half inches wide, and the rails to be laid shall be of the most approved pattern. And said company shall in all respects conform to the laws governing other horse railroad companies in the District relative to the grading and paving of the street beside and between their tracks.

That the corporators herein named are authorized to open books of subscription for the capital stock of the said company at such times and places as they shall deem most convenient, and to solicit subscriptions thereto: Provided, however, That every subscriber shall, at the time of making his subscription, pay 25 per cent. in money; otherwise said subscription shall be null and void. And when the capital shall all have been taken, the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, shall call the first meeting of the stockholders of the said company for the choice of directors; and in all meetings of the stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 9. That the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in a board of seven directors, who shall hold office for one year, and until others are duly elected and qualified to take their place as directors; and the said directors (a majority of whom, the president being one, shall be a quorum) shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, who shall also be president of the company, and they shall also choose a treasurer, who shall give bond, with surety, to said company, in such sum as the said directors may require, for the faithful discharge of his trust. In case of a vacancy in the board of directors by the death, resignation, or otherwise of any director, the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the remaining directors.

SEC. 10. That the directors shall have full power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper touching the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company, not contrary to the charter or the laws of the United States.

SEC. 11. That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholder for choice of directors, to be held at such time and place, under such conditions, and upon such notice as the said company in their by-laws may prescribe; and such directors shall annually make a report in writing to the stockholders and to the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 12. That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed which are inconsistent with any of the provisions of this act, for the purposes of this act are hereby repealed so far as the same are inconsistent herewith.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

In section 1, line 12, strike out "west side of" and "extended;" and in section 5 insert the words "Congress of" before the words "the United States."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill, as amended, was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROCK STREET, GEORGETOWN.

Mr. CLAFLIN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 4468) to abandon a portion of Rock street, in the city of Georgetown, and for other purposes.

The bill, which was read, provides that so much of Rock street in the city of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, as lies north of Bridge street, south of Olive street, and west of Monroe street, be abandoned as a public street or highway; and the title to the land heretofore occupied by said Rock street between the limits aforesaid shall vest in the owners of the lots or parcels of land on either side thereof and abutting thereon, respectively, that is to say, from the front line of their said lots or parcels of land to the center of said street, and in their heirs or assigns forever; and such lands shall hereafter be subject to taxation, and be taxed in the same manner and to the same extent as other lands in said city of Georgetown.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I desire to say that a portion of Rock street has been abandoned by the commissioners and a new street laid out to take its place. The portion abandoned is now in a dangerous condition. By the laws of the District streets when abandoned revert to the original owners. The bill is recommended by the commissioners, and should be passed at once.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOLMEAD'S CEMETERY.

Mr. CLAFLIN also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (S. No. 1108) to protect Holmead's Cemetery, in the District of Columbia, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all the right and title of the United States to and in square No. 109, in the city of Washington, commonly known as Holmead's Cemetery, be, and the same is hereby, granted to and vested in the District of Columbia, and shall be used by said District for public-school purposes, and for none other. The commissioners of the District, or their successors in office, may at any time sell any part or the whole of said square; but the proceeds of such sale or sales shall be exclusively invested in sites for public schools or in the erection or purchase of school-buildings, and shall be used for no other purpose whatever. But before making any disposition of the said square, the District of Columbia shall remove all the bodies remaining interred therein to some suitable burial-ground, together with all tombstones or other monuments remaining at the graves from which the bodies are so removed.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAFLIN. The committee also recommend an amendment to the title, as follows:

A bill to transfer the title of the United States to square 109 to the District of Columbia for the benefit of public schools thereof.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

STREET RAILROADS.

Mr. CLAFLIN also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 4579) concerning street railroads in the District of Columbia, with an amendment.

The bill, which was read, in the first section provides that package tickets issued by any street-railroad corporation, in the usual form of tickets sold by such corporation, and good for a fare not exceeding five cents, upon its route from a point in the District of Columbia to any other point in said District, in a car run therein by said corporation, shall be received as good for a passage between any two points in said District by any other street railroad corporation in any car wherein a fare not exceeding five cents is receivable; and every such corporation shall, once in a week, redeem all such tickets issued by it which shall be presented by any other such corporation, by paying therefor at the rate of four cents in money for each ticket so presented.

The second section provides that any street railroad corporation refusing to receive, as above provided, any such ticket issued by any other such corporation, or refusing to redeem, as above provided, any such ticket of its own issue, shall forfeit, for each ticket which it shall so refuse, the sum of $1, to be recovered in action of tort by the person or corporation presenting the same, to his or its own use.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That all street-railroad corporations which have for the past year or longer issued commutation tickets at less rate than charged for single fare shall be required to continue to issue them at the same rate, or less, as now charged by said street-railroad corporations; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GROUNDS SOUTH OF CAPITOL.

Mr. DAVIS, of California, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 229) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $15,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of employing the poor of the District in the work of filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol, along the line of the old canal. The commissioners of the District shall determine the plan of said work, shall see that it is properly conducted, and shall disburse the money: Provided, That a further appropriation be, and is hereby, made of the sum of $5,000, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing medical attendance, medicine, and food for the sick and infirm poor of the District, and the same shall be disbursed under the direction of the commissioners of the District.

SEC. 2. That the commissioners of the District be, and they hereby are, authorized to expend $15,000 for the relief of the poor, $7,500 to be derived from the Central Market rents and $7,500 from the general fund of said District.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is that joint resolution subject to a point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Missouri insists on the point of order that the joint resolution must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, the Chair will feel compelled to sustain it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman from Missouri will allow me I will simply state, with the indulgence of the House, that the joint resolution is undoubtedly liable to the point of order if it is insisted on. It does make an appropriation and it is just that appropriation that is made every year. It appropriates $15,000 from the Federal Treasury; and it provides for the appropriation of a similar amount from the District of Columbia for the purpose of filling up this canal, which is the property of the Federal Government, not one inch of which the District of Columbia owns. The ground from which the earth is to be taken to fill up the canal belongs to the Federal Government; the ground through which the canal itself goes belongs to the Federal Government; and I do not think anybody will be disposed to make objection on that ground. If with this statement the gentleman from Missouri insists upon the point of order, I take it the Chair will have no hesitation in declaring it must be sustained and that the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that if the bill is sent to the Committee of the Whole it will be competent at once to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business reported by the District Committee.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not insist on the point of order.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly engrossed and read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of California, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I hold in my hand a petition of the Labor League, citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for such change in the form of government for the District of Columbia as will grant to the people the right of suffrage. I ask that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your petitioners represent that they are citizens of the District of Columbia and resident tax-payers therein; that in 1874 they were deprived of the natural right of suffrage, with the distinct understanding that at the next session of Congress a permanent form of government, with the suffrage restored, would be given to the people of the District of Columbia. Since then your petitioners have patiently waited for the different committees that were appointed by Congress to make their report giving a permanent form of government to the District with the suffrage restored; but no such has appeared, and your petitioners have patiently submitted to outrage upon outrage until to-day themselves and families are on the very verge of starvation.

Your petitioners respectfully represent that it is unrepublican and undemocratic to govern this District without giving the people thereof a voice in the selection of their servants, and there is no city to-day in the civilized world of the population of Washington governed in the despotic and un-American manner in which we are here. The existing government of the District by three proconsuls, who have no just powers derived from the consent of the governed, is a notorious contradiction of the laws of God and man, and can only be construed as a direct attack upon popular sovereignty in America; and we earnestly request your honorable body to restore to us our old time-honored mayor, common council, and a full member in Congress. If two hundred thousand of the most intelligent people in the United States who now reside in this District are not entitled to be represented in Congress by a full member of Congress, then our popular government is a failure; for if the people, who are sovereigns and the source of all power, are not capable of governing themselves in Washington they cannot be said to be more capable elsewhere in the States.

The members of the Labor League of the District of Columbia during the recent strike were mainly instrumental in preserving order in the District, and one of the grievances of those who wanted to create disturbance was that we had no representation either local or national, and consequently had no more rights than dogs, and they averred that it was only through violence that the rights of labor could be achieved. Your petitioners believing otherwise and preferring to appeal to Congress under the Constitution for a full redress of grievances, passed their resolution for law and order, prevented such an outbreak in the District, and are now entitled to have their petition treated with proper respect and their many grievances redressed by law.

JOHN POPE HODNETT,
President and Founder Labor League, United States of America.
LUKE McGARVY,
Chairman Committee of Safety, District of Columbia.
THOMAS J. BURNS,
Secretary.
MARSHALL BURRIEL,
PETER STEWART,
RICHARD RAILEY,
For and in behalf of the Labor League of the District of Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The business of the Committee for the District of Columbia having been disposed of, I am ready in obedience to the resolution of the House to move that we do now adjourn.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.
Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield to the gentleman.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. BUCKNER. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That from and after Monday, the 3d of February, the hour of meeting of this House shall be at eleven o'clock a. m. during the remainder of the present session.

Mr. BUCKNER. I offer this resolution in order to avoid the necessity of having night sessions.
Mr. O'NEILL. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri whether we could not also fix an hour for adjourning, and sit later than half past four o'clock, so as to avoid the necessity of night sessions; because in the two hours from eleven o'clock till twelve and from the usual hour of adjournment till half past five we can do more business and more satisfactorily to ourselves and to the country than we can by coming here for night sessions when the House is slimly attended, members not wishing to come out at night.
Mr. BUCKNER. The object of the resolution is, if possible, to get rid of night sessions.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot allow discussion until the resolution is before the House for consideration. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania object?
Mr. O'NEILL. I do not. I merely suggest an amendment that we may do away with night sessions for the next week or two, at any rate until it is impossible for us to get along without them. We can certainly do more business in six hours during the day than we can by meeting at night.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?
There was no objection.
Mr. SPRINGER. Is it intended that the House should begin on Monday to meet at eleven o'clock?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The language of the resolution is "from and after Monday."
Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "the third" and inserting "the tenth."
Mr. ITTNER. I hope that amendment will not be made.
Mr. BUCKNER. I am willing to accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made to it.
The question being taken on Mr. DUNNELL'S amendment, it was agreed to.
Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend by striking out the word "from" and inserting the word "on;" so that it will read "on and after Monday the 10th of February," &c.
Mr. O'NEILL. I move further to amend by adding that the House shall adjourn at five o'clock p. m.
Mr. EDEN. We cannot fix the hour of adjournment.
Mr. O'NEILL. I will withdraw the amendment, but will express the hope that we will act as sensible men and do our work in the daytime.
The amendment of Mr. SPRINGER was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.
Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to call up a joint resolution which was offered some time ago, and which has been agreed to by the two committees on pensions. It is a joint resolution to construe the act passed March 9, 1878, granting pensions to soldiers and seamen of the war of 1812.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas, anticipating war with Great Britain, the Government of the United States received into its military and naval service persons who were discharged from such service less than fourteen days subsequent to June 18, 1812, the date of the formal declaration of war; and

Whereas, owing to the imperfect means of communication which existed at the date of the President's proclamation that peace had been established (February 18, 1815) between the United States and Great Britain, many persons who were received into the military and naval service of the United States to serve in the war of 1812 were retained in such service a considerable time after the establishment of peace; Now,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in the settlement of claims for pension and bounty lands on account of service in the war of 1812 the Commissioner of Pensions shall compute all the time the soldier served between June 1, 1812, and March 4, 1815, including the day of discharge.

Mr. WILSON. This joint resolution has been prepared by the Commissioner of Pensions, and is acceptable to the two pension committees of the House.

Mr. RAINEY. I desire to state that when this joint resolution was up before I objected to it for certain reasons. Having since had it explained to me, I withdraw my objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the memorial of B. F. Overton and others, delegates from the Indian Territory, remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 2687, and all kindred measures providing for a Delegate in Congress from the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of Nicholas Phelan, of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the passage of the bill granting compensation to the heirs of John Phelan, deceased, for the value of a land warrant improperly issued to a party fraudulently claiming to be the true heir of that gentleman; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOOTH presented the petition of J. G. Rutherford and others, citizens of California, praying for the passage of a law reducing the price of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in that State to $1.25 per acre, and allowing bona fide settlers to homestead one hundred and sixty acres, in place of eighty as heretofore, within those limits; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Jacob Underhill & Co. and others, citizens of San Francisco, California, praying to have refunded to them out of the unexpended balance of the Geneva award the amount of certain extra rates of insurance called war premiums paid to insurance companies who have been indemnified for their losses out of that fund; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of the Interior in relation to the inadequacy of the salary of the present governor of Wyoming Territory, and recommending that the salaries of all territorial governors be restored to the former rates of compensation, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 226) in relation to the expenditures at the industrial exposition in Paris in 1878, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it with a recommendation for its indefinite postponement. I will state the reasons which have brought the committee to this conclusion. The joint resolution only repeats what is now the law. It is made the duty of the Secretary of State to make the report called for when he shall be able to ascertain what the expenses are. It will be made at that time probably. It is impossible to make it now, because, as the committee learn, there are accounts yet unsettled for transportation both by ships and railroads; they are in the process of negotiation, but cannot to-day be ascertained. It would duplicate the work to enact this measure, and there is therefore, in the opinion of the committee, no necessity for the passage of the joint resolution, and they recommend its indefinite postponement.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Do I understand the Senator from Maine to report adversely on the joint resolution which came from the House calling for a detailed statement of the expenditures of the commissioners at the Paris exposition?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I agree with the Senator from Maine fully in what he has stated in regard to that joint resolution. I noticed it when it passed the House, and believe that it is perfectly right to have it postponed indefinitely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 989) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza A. Semple, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 4687) granting a pension to Georgine Thomas, widow of General Charles Thomas, deceased, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Margaret Conley, widow of M. Conley, late of Company A, Seventy-seventh Regiment New York Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension, to report it with a statement that the petition prays for arrearages, and is covered by the recent act on that subject. I move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1045) to place George W. Browning on the pension-roll, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4987) granting a pension to James H. Cook, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth McNeil Benham and Frances McNeil Potter, daughters of General John McNeil, United States Army, praying to be allowed a pension on account of services rendered the Government by their father during the war of 1812, submitted two reports thereon accompanied by the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 1741) granting a pension to Elizabeth McNeil Benham; and

A bill (S. No. 1742) granting a pension to Frances McNeil Potter.

The bills were severally read twice by their titles, and the reports were ordered to be printed.

No. 1744) to provide for the compilation and preservation of data showing the various positions and movements of troops engaged in the battle of Gettysburgh, and for a descriptive account of the same, with illustrations and diagrams.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The joint committee appointed by the two Houses of Congress at the last session, to inquire into the expediency of transferring the Indian Bureau and the management of Indian affairs from the Interior Department to the War Department, have had that matter under consideration and have spent a good deal of time in examining the subject; but they are unable to agree upon a report. The committee being equally divided, we are unable to make a report to the two Houses; but we have unanimously agreed to make two statements, or reports if they may so be called, and to ask that they be received by the respective Houses for consideration. I ask that privilege this morning of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The papers will be received.

Mr. SAUNDERS. In connection with the views to be presented for myself and those who agree with me, I ask leave to introduce a bill which we think is important, in order to carry out properly the report I present to the Senate, and I ask that the bill be printed and laid upon the table subject to the order of the Senate.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1743) to authorize the President temporarily to transfer the custody, control, and management of certain Indian tribes from the Interior to the War Department, and for other purposes.

The bill was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I give notice, inasmuch as there is considerable importance attached to this measure, that I shall at an early day endeavor to have the bill taken from the table and secure the action of the Senate upon it.

WINDHAM NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1560) authorizing the Windham National Bank to change its location, to report it without amendment; and I am also directed to ask for its present consideration, as it will take less time to consider it now than hereafter.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that there can be no possible objection to this bill. It is in the usual form, approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, and is merely for the change of a bank from one village to another to get on the line of a railroad.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLERICAL FORCE OF PENSION OFFICE.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on Pensions, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to report to this body, without delay, what additional clerical force is necessary in the Pension Office and in the office of the Surgeon-General of the Army to secure to applicants for pensions a prompt adjustment of their claims and to the pensioners of the Government a speedy and efficient transaction of their business.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask leave without previous notice to introduce a bill by request. I know nothing about the merits of the bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1745) for the relief of Martha W. Chubb and Mary L. Chubb, and Martha W. Chubb as administratrix of her father, Thomas J. Chubb, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Patents.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of William T. Pate & Co. be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Finance.

RAILROADS IN TEXAS.

Mr. COKE. I submit a resolution, to lie upon the table for the present, and I give notice that next Tuesday at the conclusion of the morning business I shall ask leave to submit some remarks upon it.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Railroads be requested to consider Senate bill No. 1498, providing for the construction of a railroad from Galveston, Texas, to a point on the Rio Grande River, opposite Camargo, in the Republic of Mexico; and Senate bill No. 853, providing for the construction of a railroad from San Antonio, Texas, to Laredo, on the Rio Grande; and make report on them at their earliest convenience.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. PLUMB and Mr. JOHNSTON submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes herein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. KELLOGG submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6240) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the bill (S. No. 963) to amend the record of a naval officer be taken from the Calendar and re-referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

SITE OF FORT CLARK, TEXAS.

Mr. MAXEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1627) making appropriation for the purchase of Fort Clark, Texas; which was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs without amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $50,000 for the purchase by condemnation or private contract, by the Secretary of War, as to him may seem best, of the site of Fort Clark with all the improvements thereon, but before the payment of the money good and sufficient title to the land is to be made to the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to have the Senator from Texas explain the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill is the result of a letter from the Secretary of War submitted to the Senate through the Vice-President, asking that this matter might come before Congress for prompt action.

The reason for the passage of the bill is that the title to the site of Fort Clark is not in the United States, but in a private person. The United States Government has expended upon the property about $269,000, according to the report of the Quartermaster-General. The owner of the property proposes to compromise and settle the matter by receiving the amount of $50,000 in full discharge of the title. It is a patent title from the Republic of Texas to the present owner, and the Secretary of War as well as all the other officers who have charge of the matter recommend that the purchase be made and thus quiet the title. It is the most important post in the State. There are now eleven companies there, and a schedule of the property accompanying the bill shows that the property of the Government amounts to $269,000.

The fort was originally established upon this property in 1852 by the United States Government, amounting to 3,867½ acres, under a lease between Samuel A. Maverick, the patent-holder of the title, and the deputy quartermaster-general, Colonel Tompkins, and the establishment was regularly approved by the commander of the Department of Texas, and so on by the proper officers all the way up. By the terms of that lease, a copy of which I have here, it was agreed that the United States Government might buy the property at any time within twenty years from and after the date of the lease, but that if the Government failed to do so the property should revert to the owner of the soil. That time expired in 1872. Even at common law it would be the property of the holder, but by the express terms of the lease the United States Government had full notice and knowledge that the property belonged to Samuel A. Maverick. He has since died, and the property now belongs to his widow.

A statement was called for from the Quartermaster-General to show the extent of the improvements made by the Government. Their cost is put by him at $269,000. The commanding officer at Fort Clark, General Mackenzie, testified before the committee that the same property could not be replaced for less than $150,000; that the fort was necessary, and would so remain as long as the Rio Grande continued the boundary-line of the United States, and that while another place might be got in the immediate vicinity which would probably be as eligible, there was no place more eligible than this, and the Government had expended the amount of money there that I have stated.

These are the facts in regard to this matter. The report of the Committee on Military Affairs upon the bill will show fully, if any one desires to have it read, the whole facts of the case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

Mr. MAXEY. I have the lease here, with the other papers, and they can be read also if any Senator desires.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MAXEY on the 16th instant:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1627) making an appropriation for the purchase of Fort Clark, Texas, respectfully submit the following report:

The land upon which Fort Clark is situated was located by virtue of part of the headright of Samuel A. Maverick, now deceased, and is survey No. 234, containing 3,867¼ acres, less a small strip about 146 varas (about 134 yards) wide, patented by the State of Texas to Samuel A. Maverick, September 20, 1851, No. 404, vol. 9. This being a first-class headright, acquired during the coverture of said Samuel A. Maverick, deceased, and Mary A. Maverick, his widow, she is by the laws of Texas entitled in fee to one undivided half thereof. 2. By the will of said Samuel A., duly probated, a certified copy of which is offered in evidence before the committee, Mrs. Maverick is duly authorized to bargain, sell, and convey, with good and sufficient title, any and all the lands of the testator. 3. The children and heirs of the said Samuel A. unite in a deed of relinquishment, duly authenticated, of all their interest in said land to their mother, said Mary A. An authenticated copy of said deed was also offered in evidence. A certified copy of the patent for said land covered by said survey 234, from the general land office of the State of Texas, was also offered in evidence, dated September 20, 1851, No. 404, recorded in vol. 9, record of patents, general land office of Texas. The title to said land is perfect, and in Mrs. Maverick, and has been so recognized by the Government by leases thereof since 1852 until recently, Fort Clark being situate thereon.

The War Department has heretofore urgently recommended appropriate legislation to secure title to posts in Texas. (See annual report for 1878 and the following extracts from pages 11 and 12:)

[Extract from Annual Report of the Secretary of War for 1878.]

"MILITARY SITES IN TEXAS.

"Ex. Doc. No. 282, Forty-third Congress, first session, contains the history of the efforts to obtain ownership of the sites of military posts in Texas occupied to restrain hostile Indians on the north and western frontiers of that State and to preserve the peace and protect property and life along the Rio Grande frontier.

"A board, assembled under a law of Congress, reported in favor of purchasing a number of posts on both frontiers. The Lieutenant-General, considering the doubt as to the propriety of expending money in purchase of lands for sites of posts occupied on what was supposed to be an advancing frontier, recommended the purchase of the posts along the Rio Grande only.

"Congress appropriated, 3d March, 1875, $45,000 for purchase of sites of three posts only—Fort Brown, Ringgold Barracks, and Fort Duncan—and so restricted the War Department that to this day the United States has no title to any one of these posts, and has not been able to use the money appropriated for the purchase.

"Fort Clark, which is some thirty miles from the Rio Grande, though a post on that frontier, was excluded from the appropriation, and no appropriation was made for its purchase. It has been a military post since 1852. Whenever a military post is established on unclaimed land in the wilderness of Texas, which the law of the United States does not allow the War Department to purchase from its lawful owner, the State, some person soon appears as owner with a title derived from the State, and increases with the expiration of every lease his demands for rent, though settlement has not except by the United States' own improvements yet appreciated the value of lands in its neighborhood. The buildings, temporary or permanent, necessary to protection and shelter of troops and military supplies, become under general law the property of the land-owner on termination of a lease, and the officers of the United States are helpless to guard the interests of the Government, which from want of judicious legislation is obliged to submit to the demands of the claimant as to rental, or to abandon improvements, with great damage to the United States, and great suffering to the troops, and thus incur the expenditure necessary to build a new post in some other locality on another lease, and run the same road of improvidence again, or else to abandon posts on the frontier indispensable to the defense of the people of Texas against such atrocities as are filling the newspapers of the day.

"Were the law to trust the Executive with the power to purchase sites for such military posts as it may be found necessary to establish on this Texas frontier, land could be bought for all of them at insignificant prices—fifty cents to $1 per acre; while, after spending in military occupation, and in huts, barracks, and store-houses, many thousands of dollars, these same sites are held against the United States at $10 to $100 per acre, or even higher.

"The Quartermaster-General further reports that the removal of division and department headquarters to military posts, where possible, has caused considerable expenditure to provide suitable accommodations as offices and quarters, and this expenditure makes unusual demands upon the appropriations for barracks and quarters. This additional expenditure is, however, only temporary, and it is believed that the changes in this respect required by the act of Congress passed at the last session will in the end prove to be both beneficial and economical."

In a communication of January 15 instant to Mr. MAXEY, of this committee, the Secretary requests that an appropriation for the purpose [purchase of Fort Clark] be made at the present session of Congress, in such sum as the committee may determine. The Secretary's letter is inserted, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, January 15, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to return the letter of the 18th ultimo from Mrs. Mary A. Maverick, of San Antonio, Texas, inclosed in your letter of the 9th instant, as requested.

Mrs. Maverick's proposition is as follows: "I am willing to sell the survey upon which Fort Clark is located, being survey number 234, containing 3,867 acres, (excepting a narrow strip, 146 varas in width, running across the northeastern side of the survey,) together with my interest in the buildings and improvements located thereon, for $50,000, provided that my proposition is accepted and the transfer completed prior to April 1, 1879. Title to survey, of course, warranted."

I inclose a report of the Quartermaster-General upon this proposition, dated January 13, 1879; copy of House Ex. Doc. No. 282, Forty-third Congress, first session, relative to military sites in Texas; copy of letter from Mrs. Maverick to General Vincent, assistant adjutant-general, Department of Texas, dated April 29, 1878, with the indorsements thereon; and copy of my letter of May 15, 1878, transmitting the same to the House of Representatives. I also inclose copy of my last annual report, on page 11 of which the subject of "Military sites in Texas" is considered.

Draught of a bill to authorize the purchase of Fort Clark is inclosed, with request that an appropriation for the purpose be made at the present session of Congress, in such sums as the committee may determine.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. W. McCRARY,
Secretary of War.

Hon. S. B. MAXEY,
Of Military Committee, United States Senate.

The Quartermaster-General, under date January 13, 1879, in a communication to the Secretary of War, states that Mrs. Maverick proposed, April 29, 1878, to sell the site of Fort Clark, with all improvements, for $25,000, "provided money was paid previous to June 3, 1878." General Ord, commanding Department of Texas, under date May 1, 1878, indorsed on said proposition, recommends acceptance thereof, and in connection therewith states the buildings, &c., on said land are worth from $100,000 to $200,000.

General Ord further states that "the post [Fort Clark] is the most important one in the department." This is an indorsement on a letter addressed by Mrs. Maverick to the Adjutant-General's Department of Texas, April 29, 1878, containing the proposition referred to. General Sheridan, commanding Military Division of Missouri, under date May 6, 1878, indorses the same as follows: "Not one moment should be lost in securing the offer made by the owner of the site of Fort Clark. The post will have to be retained for many years. It is of great value to us in every way, and the price asked is very low," &c.

The site selected for Fort Clark is admirably adapted to the purpose, and, situate conveniently to the Rio Grande frontier, will undoubtedly be important for many years to come. The committee here inserts the description thereof as furnished by Hon. Gustave Schleicher, now deceased, lately representing the sixth congressional district of Texas, which embraces Fort Clark:

"I desire to state that the large tract of land on which Fort Clark is situated is a remarkable tract for its fine situation, its excellent land, and beautiful pure stream of water. The head spring of las Moras, a large spring, and a bold stream of clear water issuing from that spring are contained in the tract. The country is settling fast, and lands are increasing rapidly in value. The tract is in the center of an admirable grazing country, fitting it peculiarly for a post for a large cavalry force. The improvements are of a superior order, all permanent, and constructed of hard stone; and altogether I consider the price very reasonable and the purchase of it by the Government as an act of wise economy. The geographical position is such that it will fit this place peculiarly for a permanent station near the national boundary. I strongly recommend prompt action on this proposition.

"G. SCHLEICHER."

This indorsement was made by Mr. Schleicher on a copy of the letter of Mrs. Maverick, dated December 18, 1878, containing her present proposition to sell for $50,000.

The Government failed to accept Mrs. Maverick's proposition of $25,000 according to its terms, or at all, because Congress, although strongly recommended by the Secretary of War to make the necessary appropriation, failed to do so.

Mrs. Maverick, in a communication bearing date December 18, 1878, makes proposition as follows:

"I am willing to sell the survey upon which Fort Clark is located, being survey No. 234, containing 3,867 acres, (excepting a narrow strip, 146 varas in width, running across the northeastern side of the survey,) together with my interest in the buildings and improvements located thereon, for $50,000, provided that my proposition is accepted and transfer completed prior to April 1, 1879. Title to survey, of course, warranted."

She states that at the time her first proposition was made it was quite important to her pecuniarily to make prompt sale, but that the Government having failed to accept, other arrangements were made, and the special necessity for ready money no longer exists. She proposes now to convey, with covenant and clause of general warranty, said land with its improvements for $50,000. The committee, in addition to the evidence hereinbefore referred to, took the testimony of Colonel R. S. Mackenzie, commanding Fourth Cavalry, with headquarters at Fort Clark, who agrees with Generals Ord and Sheridan as to the importance of Fort Clark, and puts the value of the improvements at $150,000, stating that like improvements could not be built for a less sum, and states that a post in that vicinity is a necessity, and will continue to be so long as the Rio Grande remains the boundary, and that if Fort Clark is abandoned another will have to be erected in same vicinity without being more eligible, and thereby the Government would suffer heavy loss. It is entirely clear to the committee that it is greatly to the interest of the Government to own the land upon which it has expended so large a sum in the erection of this fort, which is yet, and for years will be, important to the protection of the frontier. The failure to accept Mrs. Maverick's first proposition ($25,000) was a costly failure.

Mrs. Maverick's present proposition is $50,000, to be kept open till April 1, 1879. The committee has no statement to show that she will take less.

It may be said that less than a year ago she proposed to take $25,000, and that if she could afford to take that price then she could afford to take less than $50,000 now, and that the chief value of the land consists in the improvements placed there by the Government. It is doubtless true that the land would be worth nothing like that sum without these improvements, and that the land with the improvements would probably not be worth $50,000 to any party save the Government; but at last the fact is still untouched that the Government placed these improvements there with knowledge of the title under which she claims; that General Ord places the improvements at from $100,000 to $200,000; that Colonel Mackenzie, commanding the post, places the improvements at $150,000; that all agree that a post there or in that vicinity is a necessity, and will so continue so long as the Rio Grande remains the boundary; and that there is no place more eligible in the vicinity; and that if the Government abandons this post it will have to build in the same vicinity at a cost at least from $100,000 to $200,000, or, as definitely fixed by Colonel Mackenzie, at $150,000. It is also to be considered that the buildings there are substantial stone buildings, made from stone taken from the survey, as stated by Colonel Mackenzie, and these buildings, of course, the lease having expired, become under general law the property of the land-owner; so the only question left to consider, in view of the premises, is, What is the interest of the Government?

It may be said the Government acted unwisely in placing itself at so great disadvantage in erecting costly buildings on land not its own. With that the committee has nothing to do, as the Government has done so. It seems to the committee sound economy to appropriate $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purchase by the Secretary of War of said property. The committee amended the bill by filling the blank in amount with the words "fifty thousand dollars," and after the words "appropriated for the purchase," and before "by the Secretary of War," by inserting the words "by condemnation or private contract," and after the words "by the Secretary of War," the words "as to him may seem best," and, as amended, recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is evident, Mr. President, that we are not in a very agreeable situation about this property. As the Senator from Texas says, we appear by this lease to have hired this property twenty-five years ago at the rate of $600 a year; and it is now proposed that the Government shall buy it at the price of $50,000, the owner or the alleged owner having a year ago offered to sell it to us for $25,000, but there being no authority without an act of Congress to buy it, it has got up to $50,000 this year, with the prospect I suppose of making it $75,000 next year, if we do not buy it now, and so on. Whether it is not better to throw up the whole thing and lose the money that we have expended rather than to submit to extortion, will be a question for consideration.

But I submit to the Senator from Texas that on his theory the bill ought to require some little amendment. I propose, therefore, to amend the bill by striking out in line 4 the words "the purchase" and inserting the words "the acquisition."

Mr. MAXEY. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I presume my friend will have no objection to any of the amendments I suggest. I do not want to make any concession by this bill in case we cannot do anything. In line 5 I move to strike out the words "condemnation or private contract," and also in line 5 after the word "war" to insert the words "in his discretion," and in line 6 strike out the words "as to him may seem best" to continue the same idea lest it might be construed to compel him to give $50,000.

Mr. MAXEY. That is right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then in line 7 I propose to strike out the words "improvements thereon" and insert "appurtenances thereto belonging," so as to leave open the question as to whether these improvements are ours or theirs. I presume my friend has no objection to these amendments.

Mr. MAXEY. I have no objection whatever to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall make no proposition further to amend the bill as I think it ought to be amended, to provide the machinery for condemnation in case of an inability to agree, because I find it requires some care and some time to draw it up; but I merely wish to say that it seems rather obvious to me that without such a provision the Secretary of War, if he gets this land and this property, will have to pay the owner the price that the owner demands. I have no doubt, as the Supreme Court has decided, (and as my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] would say, that must make it so,) of the power of the United States to acquire private property for any proper public use in the same way that a State does, from a citizen of the United States. That has been decided in an Ohio case, and decided rightly, as I believe; but it is necessary, inasmuch as it is taken under the authority of the United States, that the officers of the United States should have the proper authority and machinery to proceed for condemnation. This bill does not contain it, and therefore I fear that the condemnation authority cannot be exercised.

There is one other question I should like to just mention, although as I say I do not interpose to stop the passage of the bill; and that is, supposing the United States buy this property from this private owner, not having any cession from the State of Texas to exercise dominion over it, then does it not follow,—I merely put it as a question,—that the State of Texas will exercise entire political dominion over this military station, and have the authority to execute its process in its ordinary ways over all the soldiery and everybody else within that fort?

Mr. MORRILL. And so as to taxation?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps it is not quite so clear about the question of taxation; I should somewhat doubt on that point perhaps; but the idea of the Constitution was that all these places for forts, and arsenals, and navy-yards, &c., should be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States as a government, and in all the normal cases, where we are not pressed for time, and have acquired private property for these public uses, provision has always been made, or almost always,—I do not know any exceptions,—for a cession by the State where the property is of this jurisdiction. I merely call the attention of the Senate to that matter for its consideration.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state for the information of the Senator from Vermont that there is a general statute of the State of Texas which confers on the United States exclusive jurisdiction of such property as may be needed for forts, arsenals, and dock-yards within the limits of the State. That point is covered by a law now in existence in the State.

So far as the question of settlement is concerned the bill followed the view presented by the Secretary of War, because the bill was submitted by him, and I have not the slightest doubt on earth that Mrs. Maverick, who is a very elegant lady, and the Secretary of War will have no difficulty in agreeing on the mode and manner of settling the price of the property. The urgency of the matter consists in the fact that her proposition ceases on the 1st of April. I ask that the bill be put on its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VINCENNES UNIVERSITY.

Mr. FULLER. I ask unanimous consent to have Senate bill No. 748 taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the bill (S. R. No. 6267) to declare the legal effect of permits granted by the President of the United States to purchase products of the insurrectionary States, accompanied by a report in writing; which was read a first and second time, with the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

VOLUNTEER NAVY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 5189) to abolish the volunteer navy of the United States, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment, be taken from the Speaker's table, and that the amendment be non-concurred in.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I move that the House ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the appointment of Mr. WHITTHORNE, Mr. HARRIS of Massachusetts, and Mr. GOODE as the committee of conference on the part of the House.

MILITARY POST AT EL PASO, TEXAS.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for action the bill (S. No. 1662) making an appropriation for the purchase of a site and for the erection thereon of a military post at El Paso, Texas.

Mr. EDEN. If unanimous consent be given to take this bill up, can a point of order be made upon it after it has been read?

The SPEAKER. It can.

The bill was read. It appropriates $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purchase of the necessary grounds and the erection thereon of a military post at El Paso, Texas, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War. Before the expenditure of any of the appropriation thereby made, good and sufficient title is to be made to the United States for the land contemplated by the act.

Mr. EDEN. Should not this bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. BANNING. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] that the Committee on Military Affairs had this question referred to them by the War Department, the Secretary of War recommending the appropriation for the establishment of this military post. The committee have unanimously directed me to ask, whenever the matter might come up before the House, that the bill be passed.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THROCKMORTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIM OF ANNA M. CLARK.

Mr. McGOWAN. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage the joint resolution (S. R. No. 31) approving the adverse decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in the claim of Anna M. Clark.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, adverse to the claim of Anna M. Clark, (Executive Document No. 12, House of Representatives, first session, Forty-fourth Congress,) be approved, and that the said claim be rejected.

Mr. McGOWAN. I ask that this bill be put upon its passage. It is necessary in order to perfect certain homestead claims.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. We ought to know something about the bill before passing it.

Mr. McGOWAN. The matter has been examined by the appropriate committees of the House and the Senate.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at thirty-one minutes after twelve o'clock. The unfinished business coming over from the morning hour of last Friday is the bill (H. R. No. 4886) to authorize the correction of boundaries of certain lands in San Mateo County, California. There are remaining eight minutes of the time of the gentleman from California, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. DAVIS, of California. The gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. GUNTER,] chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, has a statement to make.

Mr. GUNTER. I will state that out of courtesy to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM,] who is now absent, and who desires to take part in the discussion of this bill, it has been agreed by members of the committee, and also by the opponents of the bill, to ask that its consideration be postponed until the morning hour of next Friday.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. GUNTER. This proposition is acceptable to all the parties interested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas, chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, with the concurrence of the gentleman from California, [Mr. DAVIS,] asks unanimous consent that this bill go over till the morning hour of next Friday, to have on that day the same rights that it has to-day.

This request is made for the reason that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM,] who is now absent performing duty assigned him by the House, desires to be heard.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. GUNTER moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POTTAWATOMIE MISSION.

Mr. SCALES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (S. No. 351) for the relief of the domestic and Indian missions and Sunday-school board of the Southern Baptist convention, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, appropriates the sum of $2,546.87, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment to the domestic and Indian missions and Sunday-school board of the Southern Baptist convention the sum due under contract with the United States for clothing and tuition furnished to the pupils in the Pottawatomie mission-school in Kansas for the quarters ending September 30, 1860, and December 31, 1860.

Mr. EDEN. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. SCALES. The Committee on Indian Affairs have adopted the report made in the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the 4th day of November, 1848, the American Indian Mission Association on the one part and the United States, acting by William Medill, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, of the other part, entered into a written contract under seal by which the association agreed to erect in the country occupied by the Pottawatomie Indians in Kansas, for the education of their children, a suitable building of a character particularly specified for the accommodation of at least ninety pupils, to the acceptance of the United States and the agent of the tribe, and to clear, fence, and stock and furnish with tools a farm of at least one hundred acres of land, and equip workshops for the instruction of the children of the tribe in agriculture and the mechanic arts. They further contracted to receive, maintain, clothe, and educate at least ninety scholars of said tribe, or a less number if so many could not be induced to attend.

The United States agreed to pay $4,000 toward the erection of the building, and $1,000 toward clearing the land and purchasing tools, animals, &c., for the shop and farm. The United States further agreed to pay $50 a year quarterly for each pupil, and at that rate for any part of a year, toward the maintenance of the pupils.

This agreement was performed by both parties, and the amounts duly rendered, audited, and paid down to the close of the quarter ending June 30, 1860. The accounts for the two succeeding quarters were duly rendered, vouched, and allowed at the Treasury, but payment was not made for the sole reason that the office had not at its control sufficient funds for the purpose. The rebellion broke out soon after and the sums due for these two quarters have never been paid. There is due for the quarter ending September 30, 1860, the sum of $1,265.62, and for the quarter ending December 31, 1860, the sum of $1,281.25, making in all $2,546.87.

The American Indian Mission Association, by deed dated June 20, 1855, transferred all its property and rights, schools and missions, to the Southern Baptist Association, a corporation created by the laws of Georgia, and the grantee took upon itself the duties, contracts, obligations, and missionary work of the grantor. A copy of this contract was furnished to the United States, put on file at the Indian Office, and the Government signified its assent to the substitution by making payments, as aforesaid, from 1855 to 1860, to the Baptist Association. After the suppression of the rebellion the claim was presented to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and certified by him to be correct, March 24, 1874, but disallowed by the Second Auditor solely on the ground that proof of the loyalty of the claimant was not furnished, and that that office had, therefore, no power to allow the claim. (See resolve approved March 2, 1867.)

The American Indian Mission Association was one of the instrumentalities through which the Baptist denomination carried on its charitable and missionary work. The Southern Baptist convention represented that denomination in most if not all of the Southern States, and its members were divided in sentiment in regard to the rebellion pretty much like the rest of the population. Its jurisdiction and membership extended into the States of Kentucky and Missouri. Its work was purely religious and charitable. The contract out of which the present claim arises is for a missionary operation in the Territory of Kansas. Under these circumstances there is no propriety in making the loyalty of every member or every officer of the convention a condition of the fulfillment of the contract of the Government.

The committee therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. CONGER. Is not the bill subject to the point of order?

Mr. SCALES. The gentleman from Michigan will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I do not insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have been compelled to sustain it.

Mr. SCALES. I knew it was liable to the point of order. The report of the Senate committee fully explains the whole matter, and it is unnecessary to add anything further.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES O. ROBERTSON.

Mr. BOONE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 957) for the relief of James O. Robertson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROLLIN J. REEVES.

Mr. BOONE also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 1729) for the relief of Rollin J. Reeves; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ABSENTEE SHAWNEE LANDS.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 4258) for the relief of settlers on the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the provisions of the joint resolution approved April 7, 1869, for the relief of the settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas, be extended so as to allow any bona fide settler now occupying said lands, and having made improvements thereon, or the heirs at law of such, who is a citizen of the United States, or who has declared his intention to become such according to the naturalization laws, to purchase for cash the land so occupied and improved by him, not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres in each case, at not less than $2.50 per acre, at any time within one year after the passage of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and that any lands not claimed by such settlers at the expiration of that period shall be offered at public sale at the minimum rate of $2.50 per acre, notice of such sale to be given by public advertisement of not less than thirty days; and, further, that any tracts not then sold shall be thereafter subject to private entry at the same minimum.

Mr. CONGER. Is it proposed to pass that bill at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a report?

Mr. MORGAN. There is.

Mr. CONGER. I ask, then, for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

From statements received by your committee from the Secretary of the Interior and evidence submitted, it appears a small portion of the Shawnee absentee lands in Kansas, the sale of which was provided by joint resolution of Congress approved April 7, 1869, has not been disposed of at the present date. The bill under consideration provides simply that the provisions of the resolution of 1869 be extended so as to allow bona fide settlers now upon the tracts of land undisposed of to purchase the same at the same price and under the same rules and regulations as the main body of the lands were sold for. There being but two or three pieces of land which will be affected by this act, not exceeding, in the aggregate, three hundred acres, and the land now occupied by settlers who, under the provisions of this act, are allowed to purchase, the committee unanimously recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I move to insert, before the words "$2.50 an acre," the words "not less than;" so it will read "at not less than $2.50 per acre."

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing to accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

L'ANSE AND VIEUX DE SERT INDIANS.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with amendments, a bill (H. R. No. 1763) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to invest in the bonds of the United States the unexpended balance of the money appropriated to the L'Anse and Vieux de Sert bands of Lake Superior.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to invest in the bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate not to exceed 5 per cent. per annum the unexpended balance, together with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the 22d day of June, 1874, of the money appropriated to the L'Anse and Vieux de Sert bands of Chippewas of Lake Superior, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874; the principal sum and interest thereon to be expended as provided in said act.

The amendments were to strike out "five," in line 5, and insert "four;" so it would read "bearing interest at a rate not to exceed 4 per cent."

And, in lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, to strike out the words "together with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the 22d day of June, 1874."

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have some explanation of that bill and the amendments proposed to it.

Mr. HUBBELL. The bill is all right.

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PAGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMANDA M. COOK.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2623) for the relief of Amanda M. Cook, with an amendment.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Interior to deduct from any annuities due or to become due to the Cheyenne or Arapahoe Indians the sum of $5,000, and pay the same to Amanda M. Cook, formerly Amanda M. Fletcher, whose mother was killed and herself captured by the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians in the Territory of Wyoming, in August, 1865, while en route from the State of Illinois to California.

The amendment of the committee proposed to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$2,000" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEWART moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CALIFORNIA INDIAN WAR BONDS.

Mr. STEWART also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1185) for the payment of certain Indian war bonds of the State of California, with an amendment.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to W. W. Wallace, of Washington, District of Columbia, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,416.88, the amount of four Indian war bonds issued by the act of the Legislature of California approved May 3, 1852, for the suppression of Indian hostilities in that State, and for which Congress assumed the payment, appropriating the sum of $924,263, August 5, 1855, the unexpended balance of which appropriation was covered into the United States Treasury June 29, 1863.

The amendment of the committee was to add, in the seventh line, after the word "bonds," the following:

Numbered respectively 164, 166, 167, and 168.

Mr. EDEN. Let the report be read.

The report was read.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be on the amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to reserve the point of order. I do so for the purpose of asking the gentleman who reports the bill why this is an appropriation direct to the holders of the bonds, instead of to the State of California, which the Government agreed to indemnify?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make the point of order and then go on to debate the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained, and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ESTATE OF DARIUS B. RANDOLL.

Mr. GUNTER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2434) to provide for the payment of Loyol P. Brown, administrator of the estate of Darius B. Randoll, deceased, for certain improvements relinquished to the United States for the use of the Nez Percé Indians; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOANNA W. TURNER.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 4189) for the relief of Joanna W. Turner, widow of Dr. William W. Turner, late surgeon and late colonel of the Eleventh United States Colored Infantry; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH B. COLLINS.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 4648, to authorize the President to reinstate certain officers of the United States Army, a bill (H. R. No. 6270) for the relief of Joseph B. Collins; which was read a first and second time.

The substitute, which was read, authorizes the President to reinstate Major Joseph B. Collins, late of the United States Army, and to retire him in that grade as of the date he was previously mustered out, charging him with all extra pay and allowances paid him at that time.

Mr. EDEN. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred House bill 4648, submits the following report thereon:

The committee have carefully considered the said bill, and find from the report of the Adjutant-General of the Army that the bill, though general in its terms, is applicable but to one officer, Joseph B. Collins, late a major and brevet colonel of the United States Army.

The history and merit of this officer are well worthy of consideration, showing that merit and faithful service are sometimes, if not always, recognized in the military service; and a further recognition of them by the National Legislature, making provision for him in the declining years of his life, cannot but result in encouraging the rank and file to follow in like paths, hoping to receive what every true soldier struggles for—recognition at least by the country for which he imperils his life to serve.

Colonel Collins, though not bred to arms, enlisted as a private soldier at the breaking out of the Mexican war in 1846. His attention to duty and soldierly conduct soon caused his promotion to a non-commissioned officer.

He participated in the siege and surrender of Vera Cruz and the storming and capture of Cerro Gordo, in which last battle he was wounded and lost the sight of his left eye, and was discharged by reason of disability.

He was recommended by General P. F. Smith, the commanding officer of his regiment, and by his company commander, for a commission in the regular Army on account of gallant and soldierly conduct on the field of battle.

On the 29th of March, 1848, by reason of such recommendation, Collins was commissioned second lieutenant Fourth United States Infantry, and remained in the same regiment until the latter part of June, 1865, when he was ordered to Second Regiment, United States Army, having been promoted thereto.

In 1859 Colonel Collins campaigned against the Indians in California and had several engagements, in all of which he was successful.

Soon after the outbreak of the rebellion he came from California with two companies of his command and one company of the Sixth United States Infantry and joined the Army of the Potomac before Yorktown, participated in the seven days' battle before Richmond in command of his company, and from Gaines's Mill to the battles of Malvern Hill and second Bull Run was in command of his regiment. At the last-named battle he was severely wounded, from which he still suffers, and being unable by reason thereof to do field duty he was assigned to duty as chief mustering and disbursing officer of the State of Massachusetts, and was subsequently appointed military commandant.

In 1863 he had so far recovered from his wounds as to be able to do duty in the field temporarily, and joined his regiment in New York, where it was ordered to quell riots, and while there was ordered to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, as mustering and recruiting officer. He returned to the field in February, 1865, at City Point, and commanded his regiment (though but a captain) until after Lee's surrender, and then served for a time as provost-marshal in Richmond, Virginia, until he was ordered to the Second Infantry as major of that regiment, and served with it until 1869, when, upon the consolidation of the Second and Sixteenth Infantry, he was left unassigned. And without an opportunity to be heard, and without any reason or cause to him made known, a junior in rank to him was selected for the majority of the new regiment made by the consolidation, and he was forced out of the service under act of July 15, 1870, by the action of the Secretary of War, without having his case submitted to the board of officers appointed under the act.

When Colonel Collins was so forced to abandon the service there were retained of majors who were his juniors in rank and service seventeen of infantry, ten of artillery, and twenty-four of cavalry.

This discrimination against an officer who rose from the ranks and who reached the grade of major and was twice brevetted for gallant conduct in the field and twice severely wounded, and of whom all his superiors and comrades testify that he was gallant, brave, soldierly, and in all things meritorious, does not speak well of the judgment of some of the officers authorized to carry into execution the provisions of the act of July 15, 1870. The facts are a sufficient commentary.

Colonel Collins's wounds in a great measure incapacitate him for the duties of civil life. His youth and the best part of his manhood have been given his country, and it is not meet that he or others like him, entitled to consideration, should be left uncared for when they have reached the sere and yellow leaf of manhood.

The Legislature of California at its last session passed a joint resolution instructing their representatives to use their efforts to obtain justice for this officer, who was identified with her people as a protector of them from the marauding Indians who disturbed and massacred the early settlers of her territory.

The committee unanimously agree that Colonel Collins is entitled to the measure of relief provided for in this bill, but direct a special bill for his relief to be reported as a substitute for the original bill, and recommend that such substitute do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN J. B. CAMPBELL.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6271) for the relief of Captain J. B. Campbell, of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BRAGG. This is a bill for the relief of Captain J. B. Campbell, of the United States Army, from a judgment that was recovered against him in the district court in Oregon on account of his executing an order of his superior officer in removing a person who was violating the law in the Indian Territory. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. EDEN. Let the report be read.

The report was read.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order that the bill makes an appropriation, and should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

L. T. GREEN.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (S. No. 634) for the relief of L. T. Green; and moved that the same be laid on the table, and that the accompanying report be printed.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move non-concurrence in the report of the committee, and that the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $51, without interest, to L. T. Green, for rent of two houses in Chattanooga, Tennessee, from August 1, 1865, to October 31, 1865, occupied under contract with said Green, and for which said rent vouchers, properly signed, certified, and reported by the proper quartermaster, were given; and the bill appropriates the sum of $51 to pay the same.

Mr. DIBRELL. That bill passed the Senate on the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. BRAGG. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized as having control of the floor.

Mr. BRAGG. I call the previous question on the motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. DIBRELL. I believe I had the floor to move that the House non-concur in the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's object can be reached by a vote on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG.]

Mr. EDEN. If we are to be called upon to vote on this bill, I should like to hear the report read.

The report was read.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask that the Senate report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the report of the Senate is not among the papers.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is the bill under consideration now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] desired to reserve the point of order.

Mr. EDEN. I do not make the point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Then I make the point of order.

Mr. EDEN. The motion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin was to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. What becomes of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It would go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar if the point of order is insisted upon.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I do not make the point of order against the motion to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make a qualified point of order.

Mr. DIBRELL. I desire to have the bill put upon its passage.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I will withdraw the point of order if the pending motion is to lay the bill upon the table and we can have a vote upon that.

Mr. BANNING. I renew the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made, the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1811) donating condemned cannon to Bayard Post, No. 8, Grand Army of the Republic, of Trenton, New Jersey, to be placed in a lot in Greenwood Cemetery, Trenton, held as a free burial-place for ex soldiers, sailors, and marines; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to beprinted.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 5176) to donate condemned ordnance to the Union Township Monumental Association at Milford Centre, Ohio.

Mr. MAISH. I ask for the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 124) granting a pension to James B. Treadwell, major of the Eighty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 309) for the relief of Andrew F. Higgins, of Brown County, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 4975) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Eliza H. Frailey;

A bill (H. R. No. 4986) granting a pension to H. Louise Gates; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5219) granting a pension to Belinda MacDonald.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following case:

To Mr. O'NEILL, for two days, beginning to-day.

BARK GRAPESHOT.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 964) for the relief of the owners of the bark Grapeshot, and moved that it be recommitted to the committee and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. Where is the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is in committee; the gentleman only asks that the bill with the accompanying report be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

E. E. RICE.

Mr. COX, of New York, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6273) providing to compensate E. E. Rice for property transferred by him to the Government of the United States for the use of the diplomatic and consular representatives at Hakodadi, in Japan; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL SEMINARY.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and pending that motion I move that all debate upon the pending bill (H. R. No. 943) for the relief of the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Seminary and High School in Virginia be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that. I think it is not necessary to limit debate until we have been heard upon the bill. There will be no trouble about limiting it to a reasonable time for debate.

Mr. BRIGHT. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CONGER. I cannot say.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have no wish to cut off debate, but the bill has already been debated.

Mr. CONGER. I think the motion had better not be made now. The committee can rise, if necessary to close debate.

Mr. BRIGHT. I think ten minutes will be sufficient for gentlemen to state their opposition to the bill. Unless there is some other time insisted on, I shall adhere to my motion to limit debate to ten minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I suggest to the gentleman to modify his motion so as to limit general debate to one hour.

Mr. BRIGHT. I cannot do that.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Then I make that motion.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania; and upon a division there were—ayes 43, noes 53.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. BRIGHT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 59, noes 74.

No further count being called for, the amendment of Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, was not agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman will accept half an hour.

Mr. BRIGHT. I would have done so before, for I am disposed to be liberal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks time will be saved by coming to some understanding.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will modify my motion so as to limit general debate to thirty minutes.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT. I suppose the time will be equally divided between the two sides.

The SPEAKER. That is usual and just.

Mr. BRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote limiting debate; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] is sick and will be unable to serve as one of the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the fortification appropriation bill. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] will be excused, and the Chair will appoint in his place Mr. SPARKS, of Illinois.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of proceeding with the business upon the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, Mr. COVERT in the chair.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL SEMINARY, VIRGINIA.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the business upon the Private Calendar. The pending bill, when this character of business was last under consideration, was the bill (H. R. No. 943) for the relief of the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Seminary and High School in Virginia. By order of the House all general debate on this bill has been limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. This claim is of so dangerous a character as a possible precedent that I beg to add briefly to the argument I made against it when it was before the House two weeks ago. I must repeat the ground of legal liability I then resisted. In examining this and other bills of kindred character recently I have found some precedents which are exactly in point and controlling the pending measure. I speak of them here by way of emphasis of the resistance I felt it my duty to make when this bill was last before the House when I spoke at more length. I am opposed heart and soul to claims of this and similar character. I know the seductive influence of church associations upon members of Congress as well as upon other people. This bill has the persuasive moral aid of a theological seminary for a most influential Christian church. The names of Bishop Meade, Bishop Johns, and other clerical gentlemen of most eminent and reputable character, can be echoed in favor of what I deem the extravagant demands of the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Seminary and High School of Virginia. Let us, however, turn a deaf ear to soft whisperings from churches or clergymen we love and look at a legal question.

The Committee of the Whole will observe, by reference to the report of the standing committee reporting the bill and to the debate in the House when the bill was before us two weeks ago, that the claim for damages done to the property by the soldiery during the war is said to be withdrawn. The well-defined principles of public law so clearly ignore any claim for damages through the ravages of war done to this theological seminary at Alexandria that it is denied the appropriation here contemplated is an indemnity for war damages. A more seductive expedient is employed. The legal liability of the Government, which raises a moral obligation to pay, is artfully presented. The claim, forsooth, of rent for use and occupation by the Government troops of the property as a hospital is set up, the legal liability of the United States for rent! How is it? The report recites the application of this bill is only for the rent—the just and reasonable rent—of the property from 1861 to 1865. Twenty thousand dollars are asked. The claim itself is extravagant and unreasonable. But let us inquire as a dry question of law if, under any legal principles controlling us, there is a Government liability. Read the report and the arguments of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] and there is no allegation of a contract; there never was a contract made between the reputed owners of this property and any agent or authority of the Government of the United States.

The fact is this property was taken possession of by United States troops while war was flagrant, in 1861, at a time when the Government was erecting fortifications around the city of Alexandria to resist the advance of the enemy. Alexandria was to be a strategic point for operations against the enemy then threatening Washington. The whole atmosphere of that locality was full of treason and rebellion. It was in the enemy's country, indeed. This property, this seminary for which rent is claimed, was just on the line of fortifications, just within the defenses. It was in the very theater of war during the entire period for which payment is now claimed. If that is so, and there is no question about it, there is no legal liability on the part of the Government. Disguise it as you may, this is essentially a war claim, a claim for the use and occupation of property in a portion of the country where war was flagrant.

The argument made against that position is that the city of Alexandria was within the lines of the Union Army, that practically it was under the complete control and jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and consequently a claim of quantum meruit can be properly set up against the Government of the United States for the use and occupation of this property even if there was no specific contract, either in writing or by parol.

In point of fact, as matter of history, war was practically flagrant at Alexandria during all this period. At no time was it regarded otherwise by Mr. Lincoln when he issued the proclamations by virtue of the acts of Congress authorizing him to make them. It will be observed that while he did issue a proclamation in 1861 to induce persons to return to their allegiance to the Government, Alexandria was not named in that proclamation; it was not intended that it should be included in it, because it was between the lines of the two armies, and under section 5302 of the Revised Statutes it was so contiguous to the enemy's lines that all commercial intercourse between the citizens of Alexandria and the rebels was practically forbidden.

More than this, the Forty-third Congress set a precedent in a very much stronger case than this. I hold in my hand the report made on the 22d of June, 1874, by the then chairman of the Committee on War Claims in the case of the Mount Vernon Manufacturing Company of Alexandria, Virginia. That was a claim made by a corporation; and the same point was urged that is presented here—that the charge of disloyalty could not be raised against a corporation. It was claimed that an officer of the United States Government when he took possession of the factory of the Mount Vernon Manufacturing Company for a prison in which to confine rebel prisoners, made a contract to pay the owners a stipulated price; and upon this state of facts they came to Congress in 1874 and sought to obtain an appropriation in fulfillment of that contract.

In that case the question now presented was made in all its bearings. I read from the report made by the then chairman of the Committee on War Claims in disposing of that question:

> Alexandria was in a State proclaimed in insurrection. The alleged occupancy of this factory was during flagrant war. The President's proclamation of August 16, 1861, mitigated the severe rules of international law in some respects in favor of districts permanently conquered.
>
> But these exceptions—

Mark the language:

> But these exceptions were withdrawn by the proclamation of April 2, 1863, except as to a few favored localities, of which Alexandria was not one.
> And the act of Congress which took effect February 21, 1867, prohibited payment for use and occupation. This act was declaratory of public law, and fixed the position of the Government.

Now, observe it was not damages claimed in that case. It was for rent on a contract, the claimants averring Alexandria, where their property was located, was not in insurrectionary territory, but under continual jurisdiction and control of United States authorities. That was the same Alexandria as the one before us now.

It will be thus seen that in the Forty-third Congress a precedent was established in a case presenting stronger legal grounds than this, a case where there was a specific contract made between the agents of the Government and the owners of the property. This House rejected that claim, and the decision has never been reversed. I defy the gentleman from Virginia who reported this bill or any one advocating it, to cite me a precedent for payment by the Government for use and occupation of property belonging to disloyal persons during the war in Alexandria.

Furthermore, the Government, through the Quartermaster's Department, made a decision in 1865, in what is known as the Murfreesborough case, reciting the position I now contend for. This was the decision in the claim of Mrs. C. S. D. Willard. In that case it was contended, and in evidence, too, that a contract had been made between Mrs. Willard and proper Government authority. The officer of the Government to whom this case was referred, in deciding it uses the following language:

> Murfreesborough was a hostile town captured by our troops from an enemy who did not surrender on terms, but was driven out by force of arms. Everything in it was prize of war, as at Savannah and Atlanta. Buildings were occupied for shelter of troops, and for sick and wounded soldiers of the capturing enemy.
>
> It does not appear that the military department should order payment of any rents under such circumstances. When active operations of war are over, and peace is restored to the district, the Government will doubtless give up the property which it does not confiscate as rebel property, or as used against it, or will pay rent from the time of restoration of peace and re-establishment of civil authority.
> Claims for destruction of property, fences, crops, &c., in hostile districts by the march or occupation of troops are on the same footing as claims for rent of buildings in captured towns.

The decision in this Murfreesborough case represents the recognized practice of the Government upon claims of this kind. It epitomizes the true legal doctrine regulating claims for use and occupation of property within the territory of the enemy, or for what has been wrested from them. To pay the present claim would violate the doctrine of stare decicis, would defy both law, well defined public law, and repeated precedent. The decision I have just cited is one made by the proper accounting officer of the Government under the statute of July 4, 1864, authorizing the settlement of claims kindred to this. The same principles determine claims for the use of property in Charleston, Atlanta, Nashville, and other towns captured by the Union Army. Alexandria, I submit in all fairness, comes within the same category. In the case I have just cited the circumstances were much stronger than in that now before us, because it was claimed that there was a contract for the payment of rent. The evidence in the case sustained the allegation; yet Congress refused to pay because Alexandria was insurrectionary territory.

I submit that under the rules of international or public law the Government is not responsible for the destruction or use of property when war was flagrant. It is not responsible for the use and occupation of this property after getting control of it, because this property was in a State that was in insurrection. If the proclamation of the President of August 16, 1861, could be construed as specially excepting Alexandria and similarly situated places from the effects of such proclamation, that condition of things was modified and entirely changed by the proclamation of April 2, 1863, which placed all those States that were in actual rebellion, Virginia included, upon the same basis.

Hear the proclamation of April 2, 1863, or so much of it as affects this bill; you will find it in the Statutes at Large, volume 13, page 731:

> Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do hereby revoke the said exceptions—

Meaning those mentioned in the proclamation of August 16, 1861—

> and declare that the inhabitants of the States of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, Florida, and Virginia (except forty-eight counties of Virginia designated as West Virginia) are in a state of insurrection, &c.

Now, Alexandria City is in Alexandria County, Virginia, and is not embraced in the language or spirit of the exception in the proclamation. Then let me ask gentlemen to read in this connection also section 5302 of the Revised Statutes.

It has been said Alexandria was represented in our Congress during the time the rent is claimed for this property. This is a mistake. The existing condition of things was recognized by Congress in 1863. This territory was recognized as peopled by a population disloyal to the Government, and representation in Congress was denied. It was represented, however, all the while in the rebel congress at Richmond. Disregarding all prejudices, this is a war claim and has no standing here. It will not do to say this claim is sui generis—that there are but a few of such cases. Why, sir, the valuable report which I hold in my hand epitomizes a series of claims of this character presented up to 1874. They embrace the claims of Methodist churches, Episcopal churches, Christian churches, universities, and colleges, whose buildings all over the Southern States were occupied for hospital purposes when the Government established posts there. Why, indeed, we have claims from counties for using their court-houses during the war for hospital purposes. There is an avalanche of claims of this nature. This list I have in my hand amounts to more than $2,000,000. Sir, they will be piled Pelion upon Ossa if we heed not the line of safe precedent and reject them all. Let us stop right here.

Let us stand upon the record which was made by the Forty-third Congress and refuse to appropriate money to pay this claim. The well-recognized legal principles I have just invoked sufficiently dispose of this bill. I had occasion when the bill was before us heretofore to discuss that other feature which is fatal to the bill. While true it is a corporation—an eleemosynary corporation—the management of it was disloyal. There may have been and were certainly loyal men of the Episcopalian Church North interested in this seminary; yet the substantial interests were in Virginia and were disloyal. The influence of the institution at the beginning of the war was against the Government. The policy of the act of 1867, established by Congress, forbids the payment of such claims to disloyal claimants. There is no claim, then, legal or equitable, on the American Congress to pay indemnity to citizens and interests which were disloyal to the Government, and who aided to bring the sufferings of the rebellion upon us.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I will reserve my remaining five minutes.

Mr. GOODE. If no gentleman on the other side desires to address the committee now, I will take the floor and yield ten minutes to my colleague [Mr. HUNTON] in whose district this seminary is located.

Mr. HUNTON. It has never been maintained, as asserted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Chairman, that there was a legal claim on the Government of the United States for the payment of this rent. If such had been the case we would not have been before the Congress of the United States asking an appropriation. The very fact that we are here seeking at the hands of the Congress of the United States a law authorizing the payment of this claim is certainly to all intents and purposes a declaration or admission on our part that there is no law now under which this claim can be paid.

What we do maintain is that this claim comes within the spirit of the laws on the subject of the payment of such claims, and is only prohibited by a technical ruling of the law of 1867. And it is because this claim comes within the equity of the law for payment of such claims that we ask the Congress of the United States to pass a bill to pay it.

The gentleman says there are precedents against this claim, that one arose in Atlanta, Georgia. That, I submit to the committee, has no sort of bearing on this case.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Murfreesborough, Tennessee.

Mr. HUNTON. It was not permanently within the lines of the Federal Government during the war.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. It was always, after we took it.

Mr. HUNTON. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that Alexandria and the surrounding country were certainly within the line of fortification of the Federal troops to defend the city of Alexandria, and by the declaration of the President of the United States it was loyal territory, within the possession and under the control of the Federal Government and the Federal Army from the first day the ordinance of secession was ratified in that State until the termination of the war. The gentleman says this theological seminary was in the line of fortification. That is a mistake. It was not in the line of fortification, but within the line. The line of fortification to defend Alexandria embraced every building for which we ask rent in this bill, and being within the line of fortification, it was as much a part of the Federal territory during the war as any square foot in the District of Columbia. That being the case, Mr. Chairman, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered in regard to New Orleans the doctrine was settled that a territory thus situated in the permanent occupancy and under the permanent control of the Government of the United States was under the protection of the Federal Government.

Then, sir, if that be so, and surely it is, because as I stated the other day this territory upon which these buildings are located was represented in the Congress of the United States for four years of the war, there can be no good ground of opposition to the payment of this claim for rent. For there was in the State of Virginia during the war what was known on this side of the river as the loyal Legislature of the State of Virginia. That loyal Legislature soon after the beginning of the war—I am not prepared to say at what exact period—had its domicile in the city of Alexandria.

Mr. TUCKER. After May, 1863.

Mr. HUNTON. I am informed that it was after May, 1863. That government was represented by two Senators in the other wing of the Capitol, and this very territory where these buildings are situate sent delegates to the convention for the purpose of nominating a member to this House of Representatives. Yet we are told on this floor, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, notwithstanding the fact that this territory was represented in both wings of the Capitol, notwithstanding all that, we are told it was a disloyal territory, under the control of the confederate government, and therefore this is a southern war claim which ought not to be paid.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Was it not represented at Richmond in the confederate congress?

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Was not all this territory represented in the confederate senate?

Mr. HUNTON. There was an election for officers of the confederate government in the confederate army. I should like to know how an election could be held in Alexandria or within this territory for the confederate congress, when the territory itself was within the fortifications of the Federal Army.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Did not the confederate congress recognize the officials thus elected?

Mr. HUNTON. They recognized those who were elected by the confederate army. There was not a vote cast within the limits of this territory for any confederate official of any description at any time after the date I have mentioned. I trust the gentleman is answered.

This claim has been represented as fair and proper by Federal officers. It was recognized by Mr. Stanton while Secretary of War; it was recognized by Mr. Belknap while he was Secretary of War, and the only reason why Mr. Belknap did not pay it was that after he had promised to pay it he discovered what he had forgotten at the time, that the provisions of the law of 1867 prohibited the payment of any claim within the boundary of any seceded State. Mr. Belknap, however, recommended the very course which these people are pursuing to-day in having recourse to Federal legislation. I desire to have read as part of my remarks a letter which I have received on the subject just alluded to.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA, January 25, 1879.

About the year 1866, while Mr. Stanton was Secretary of War, the claim of the Theological Seminary and High School of Virginia, for the use of their property for hospital purposes, which claim embraced rent, loss of furniture, fencing, trees, and some buildings, was made out and presented to the War Department. The Secretary of War was called upon by Dr. Sparrow, who was then a professor in the seminary, and also by Rev. Dr. Hall, of Washington, now of New York. Mr. Stanton had at the time organized a military commission to examine into the many claims which were then being presented to the Department, some of which he, I suppose, thought ought to be paid, and others he knew ought not. He referred this claim to this commission, and recommended it, as I understood, by indorsement to the favorable consideration of the commission. I remember calling at the office of the commission, with the view of urging action on the case, and of seeing the papers in the hands of the clerk. Shortly afterward the commission was dissolved, as I understood, in consequence of the act of 1867. I have several times tried to get possession of these papers by application at the War Department, but they seem to have been lost or mislaid.

I had a case of my own for rent of a warehouse in Alexandria, used by the commissary department. My partner had been in the South during the war, and I had not been further South than Alexandria. I applied to the quartermaster for payment for my half of the rent, &c., and was refused. I appealed to Mr. Stanton, and in my interview with him referred to a letter from my brother-in-law, Henry Winter Davis, giving his opinion that I ought to be paid. Mr. Stanton heard my statement, took the papers from my hands, indorsed on them, overruling the decision of the quartermaster, and ordering payment, and I got the money.

When General Belknap was Secretary of War I went to see him, in company with the late Dr. Sparrow, in reference to this seminary claim. We stated the case to him. Without any qualification or hesitation, he said that we were entitled to rent, and that he would pay a bill for a reasonable and proper rent, but would not pay for damages or loss of property. At his suggestion a bill was made out for rent only and sent to him, which had the approval of the medical department. He replied that when he promised payment he had overlooked the act of 1867, and that we would have to go to Congress.

I think one reason that led the Secretaries of War, Stanton and Belknap, to favor the payment of rent for these buildings was the fact that they were located in what was considered loyal territory; that they had been in the hands of the Federal Government from the beginning to the close of the war; and also that there was no such institution like situated to make a claim upon the Government to be used as a precedent.

CASSIUS F. LEE.

Mr. HUNTON. It appears from that communication that this claim for rent, after all the claims for damages were excluded from it, was indorsed as right and proper by the Surgeon-General of the Army and two Secretaries of War, and would have been paid but for the law of 1867. Nay, more; it appears from this communication that Cassius F. Lee, one of the trustees of this institution, was by Mr. Stanton paid the rent for a warehouse in the city of Alexandria, which was used by the Federal troops for somewhat similar purposes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move that my colleague be allowed ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be allowed under the order of the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to the gentleman's proceeding, but his time cannot be extended under the order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The colleague of the gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I make no objection.

Mr. HUNTON. I have but a few remarks more to make. It appears from this communication—which is as true as any part of the Bible, because the gentleman who makes it is incapable of telling anything but the truth—that the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, actually paid to the author of this communication, who was one of the trustees for this theological seminary, rent for his warehouse in Alexandria, occupied for similar purposes by the Federal troops. The claim has been indorsed by all the Departments of the Government, and the very course we are pursuing here is the course recommended by these Federal officers for us to pursue.

Something was said the other day by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] about the faculty of the seminary. I desire to say a word or two on that subject, and I shall read from a communication I have received, which gives me the information:

The first professor was Rev. Dr. Keith, of Vermont, who was connected with the seminary from its origin, in 1823, till his death in 1842. He now lies buried at Sheldon, in his native State. The next is Rev. Dr. Packard, of Maine, who is still there. The third was Rev. Dr. May, of Pennsylvania, who died in Philadelphia during the war. The fourth was Rev. E. R. Lippitt, who was professor in this seminary from 1826 to 1842. He was a native of Rhode Island. Rev. Dr. Sparrow, who succeeded Dr. Keith in 1842, and continued till his death in 1874, was a native of Massachusetts, though for some years a professor at Kenyon College, Ohio, from whence he came to Virginia. At Kenyon he was the preceptor of Mr. Stanton and Henry Winter Davis, who were very much attached to him, and I believe also the present President of the United States. The professor who succeeded Dr. Sparrow is Rev. Dr. McElheny, a native of Pennsylvania, who came to Virginia from Ohio since the war, and is still connected with the seminary. The only other professors are Messrs. Walker and Nelson.

I read this in order to show that this institution was not in any sense of the word a sectional institution; its professors mainly, if not all of them, came from Northern States, and its students, both of divinity and of the literary course in the high school, were from all parts of the United States, and in no sense that I can imagine can any sectional feeling or sectional action be attributed to the Theological Seminary of Virginia.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CONGER. I am pleased to see this returning sense of justice to the distinguished Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton. When my friend from Virginia claims the passage of this bill because one of its officers was the preceptor and the intimate friend who gave tone to the views and energy to the life of that distinguished Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, I rejoice to see my southern friends claiming the payment of all these war debts on the ground that those interested in them were the especial friends of that distinguished Secretary. I wish that admiration and that excessive love for the distinguished Secretary had existed in prior days and had exhibited itself somewhat during his life-time.

Sir, the letter which the gentleman from Virginia has had read, claiming that the writer received pay from Mr. Stanton on the recommendation of his brother-in-law, Henry Winter Davis, comes under the same category. Because Henry Winter Davis was a loyal man of Maryland, and because his brother-in-law was paid for a warehouse, the whole of these claims, in the mind of the gentleman from Virginia, seem to turn upon the relations of kindness and friendship which existed between the different claimants and their friends and Mr. Stanton. Justice will yet be done to that great man, and I rejoice to see it coming so rapidly even in the prosecution of war claims.

But, sir, we cannot ignore the fact that this Fairfax Seminary, the grounds on which it stood, and all its buildings, were inclosed all around by fortifications. It stands in the center yet of the earthworks erected to protect this Capitol and this city and Alexandria and all our troops, and rent is demanded for all these buildings for four years when the report shows they were not occupied by our troops for four years. For a longer time than they were occupied rent is demanded, for the use of buildings which we were compelled to build fortifications around in order to protect them from destruction by the enemy. We inclosed them within a circle of fortifications. We planted our guns from these buildings as a center, pointing forth in all directions toward the enemy, and we preserved these buildings from destruction.

Was it a proper place, I ask, for these holy men to pursue their lessons of divinity amid the firing of cannon and all the uproar of war? Shall we pay rent for these buildings for the time during which we protected them from destruction? We protected the seminary, and handed it back to these holy men unimpaired; perhaps not quite unimpaired; we had somewhat injured these buildings, and the Government of the United States, with a generosity becoming our great Government, expended about $900 in the repair of the buildings so occupied by them in order to put them in as good condition as it found them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, was received, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1560) authorizing the Windham National Bank to change its location; and

A bill (S. No. 1627) making appropriation for the purchase of Fort Clark, Texas.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL SEMINARY, VIRGINIA.

The CHAIRMAN. General discussion on the pending bill is now exhausted, and the question is upon laying aside the bill to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HUNTON. The five minutes occupied by me was by consent of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. That was understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair inclines to the belief that the committee has not the power to give that extension of time. The time was limited by the direction of the House.

Mr. GOODE. It was certainly understood that five minutes additional was given to my colleague and it was conceded upon the other side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will so regard it.

Mr. GOODE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. The first duty of the Government is to do justice, and it is as much its duty to do justice about war claims as about peace claims. Now what is justice about war claims? The settled rule of law is that the Government is not liable for property destroyed in the enemy's country by the operations of war or taken for the use of the Government forces. That is a settled and necessary rule. We made an exception to that in this country by providing by statute a right—not a remedy, a right—for loyal citizens in the South for property taken for the use of the Army. The right provided by that statute has expired. I said the other day that I thought it ought not to be revived. Why? Because the proportion of loyal citizens in the South who had no opportunity to present their claims is very small, and because to restore such a right would open the door for a flood of pretended claims, and because at this late period it would be so difficult to distinguish between real and fraudulent claims, for which reasons the general public policy is against the revival of that class of claims.

Now, let me say here that these claims by loyal citizens, although called southern claims, are not necessarily so, since a large portion of the claimants have since the war moved into the Northern States. I have numbers of them now in my district, as have other gentlemen from the North. But wherever they reside, they have had their day in court; their opportunity has gone by, and if Congress again restores them a right to recover it would, on the whole, I think, be a mistake, and not for the interest of either the South or the North. But how is it in regard to this claim? If I understand it, claims like these are not war claims, and are not subject to the objection that they are claims for property destroyed in the enemy's country. This seminary building was wanted for a hospital, and an officer of the United States Army applied for it for that purpose and took possession of it. There was an implied contract then that the owner of the property should be paid, just as there was an implied contract in the case of the Alexandria mill, discussed at the last session. Now, why ought not such a claim to be paid? The parties could have gone into the Court of Claims before 1867 and recovered on their implied contract but for the repeal of the statute which took away from the Court of Claims jurisdiction of such cases. But that repeal did not destroy the right; it only took away the remedy; and when there is a right we are bound to supply a remedy. A man has no right to recover for property taken in the enemy's country by the march of our armies. But this property did not lie in insurrectionary territory at all, but in territory excluded from the proclamation of President Lincoln.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman recently read the proclamation of the President of 1863, declaring that all the States engaged in war, without exception, were insurrectionary States?

Mr. POTTER. That proclamation excepted this identical territory.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Upon the question of fact allow me to differ with my distinguished friend from New York. I have in my hand the proclamation of the President. Will the gentleman allow me to read it?

Mr. POTTER. Let the gentleman send it to me.

This territory never was in the enemy's country. It lay within the defenses of Washington, and never was in the possession of the enemy at all. It does not, therefore, come under the rules of the law which prohibits parties from recovering for property destroyed in the enemy's country. On the contrary it was always within our lines and the owners stood in the same position with every other person within our lines, and the only reason why they cannot recover in the Court of Claims for the use of this property is because this little piece of territory was included in the general statute abridging the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims. The owners were therefore left without a forum, and had to come to Congress for relief, not because they had no right, but because they had no tribunal in which to establish their right.

If it is right to pay this claim it should be paid without reference to whether the claimant is a religious institution or not. It is quite true that this was a religious institution supported chiefly by persons in my own State and Pennsylvania, but quite independent of that it had a right, as it seems to me, to be paid a fair price for the rent or use and occupation of buildings taken for hospital purposes. Does this bill cover anything more?

Mr. HUNTON. Nothing else.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Then we shall have to pay rent for all the lands occupied by the Government for the building of forts to protect this city.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know that Congress refused to pay Pennsylvania for the use and destruction of property at Gettysburgh?

Mr. POTTER. Certainly not; for those were occupied and destroyed by acts of war—not this case at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for the discussion of this bill has more than expired.

Mr. POTTER. Let me read the proclamation of the President. It is as follows:

Except the inhabitants of that part of Virginia lying west of the Alleghany Mountains and of such other parts of that State and the other States hereinbefore named as might maintain a legal adhesion to the Union and the Constitution.

Now, I understand that proclamation to have been modified in 1863, and there is some confusion from the general terms of the later proclamation. But, as a fact, it is nonsense to talk of territory always within our lines and where the State government of Virginia recognized by our Government sat, and which was represented in the Congress, as being enemy's territory.

The question was taken on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation; and on a division there were—ayes 57, noes 45.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER and Mr. GOODE were appointed.

Mr. CONGER. I will withdraw the point of order as to the absence of a quorum; we can have a vote upon it in the House.

Mr. BRAGG. I renew the point of order.

Mr. BURCHARD. Pending the question now before the committee, I move to strike out the enacting clause of this bill.

Mr. EDEN. Is that in order? The question before the Committee of the Whole is upon ordering the bill to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House. A vote was taken upon that question and the point of order raised that no quorum had voted. The committee therefore is still dividing on that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.]

Mr. CONGER. I withdrew the point of order that no quorum voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was renewed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] and the Chair will appoint that gentleman one of the tellers in place of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] The tellers will take their places.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 64, noes 53.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will continue their count, and the Chair trusts that every member will vote on one side or the other, so that the committee will not find itself without a quorum.

The tellers proceeded with the count, but before the announcement was made,

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, withdrew his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order having been withdrawn, the bill will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BRAGG, (one of the tellers.) I beg pardon of the Chair; but I ask the Chair to announce the vote so far as the tellers have made it.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote as reported from the tellers so far as continued is ayes 68 noes 70. Therefore the bill will not be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HUNTON. The point of order that no quorum voted was withdrawn while members were passing between the tellers. In consequence of that, I think that some members did not come forward and vote.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is any dispute in regard to the count, the Chair will direct the tellers to resume their places and the vote will be again taken.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand this to be the condition of the vote; it is distinctly understood and agreed to all around that the vote as first announced was in favor of the bill: but after other members had voted there was a majority against the bill. The inquiry I desire to make is whether the vote shall be as first announced or as announced the second time?

The CHAIRMAN. The vote will be taken again.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. A new vote?

The CHAIRMAN. An entirely new vote.

Mr. BURCHARD. If there should be an adverse vote, will the bill be left in Committee of the Whole or reported to the House with that adverse vote?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be left in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is it competent now to move that the bill be laid aside to be reported adversely to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not now in order. The committee is dividing upon the question of laying aside the bill to be reported favorably to the House.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 76, noes 78.

So the proposition to lay the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House was not agreed to.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 88, noes 44; no further count being called for.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. EDEN. Must not the committee now rise and report this bill to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be the report to the House when the committee shall rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it is the duty of the committee, when the enacting clause of a bill is stricken out, to at once rise and report that fact to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Under what rule?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not the rules before me, but I think that is required.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the rule upon the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

123. A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend; and, if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection. Whenever a bill is reported from a Committee of the Whole, with a recommendation to strike out the enacting words, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommitted to the said committee without further action by the House. But before the question of concurrence is submitted, it is in order to entertain a motion to refer the bill to any committee, with or without instructions, and when the same is again reported to the House, it shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole without debate, and resume its original place on the Calendar.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the custom has been (I speak, of course, only from memory) that whenever the enacting clause of a bill is stricken out in Committee of the Whole, the committee immediately rises for the purpose of ascertaining whether the House will agree to such recommendation, or whether the bill shall resume its place upon the Calendar in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee now rise and report the action of the Committee of the Whole to the House upon the pending bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and (Mr. EDEN taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore) Mr. COVERT reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 943) for the relief of the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Seminary and High School in Virginia, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now upon concurring in the recommendation of the committee to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, the title of which has been reported to the House.

Mr. BURCHARD. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 122, nays 89, not voting 77; as follows:

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the enacting clause was stricken out; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, moved the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. COVERT in the chair.

HEIRS OF BRIGADIER-GENERAL WILLIAM THOMPSON.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 934) for the relief of the heirs of Brigadier-General William Thompson, of the revolutionary army.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to state an account in favor of the heirs of William Thompson, who was a brigadier-general in the revolutionary army, from Pennsylvania, for the seven years' half pay provided for under the resolutions of Congress of May 15, 1778, August 24, 1780, and June 3, 1784; and whatever sum of money so found is hereby directed to be paid to Fannie A. Thompson, one of said heirs and administratrix de bonis non of said William Thompson; and a sufficient sum of money to pay the amount found is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions were read, as follows:

In line 12 strike out the words "one of said heirs," and in lines 13 and 14 strike out the words "and a" and in lieu thereof insert "for the heirs of said William Thompson," and add to the end of the bill "provided that no interest be allowed on said claim."

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Chairman, that claim belongs to a class which involves some important questions and a good deal of money. There has been pending almost from the foundation of the Government a claim of this character on behalf of the heirs of certain revolutionary officers. There was a law passed under which they were entitled to half pay for five years, and afterward another law was passed under which a sum certain was paid to them as commutation for this half pay. That commutation has been paid to them already, but the heirs of those officers now claim that the amount of commutation was not sufficient. They have had their claims before Congress for at least sixty or seventy years, claiming in lieu of the gross sum which was given as commutation they should have received the amount of half pay. The law providing for commutation was passed, I believe, at the request of the officers themselves, and the amount under that law was received and accepted by them; and, whether just or unjust, it was a long time ago, and as the law was never opened in favor of those officers in their own life-time it occurs to me as hardly right it should now be opened in favor of their great-grandchildren.

The amount involved in these claims is variously estimated at from five to twenty-five million dollars. As a matter of course, if we pay one we must pay all. I happen to know something about these claims of the heirs of revolutionary officers for the reason that ever since I have been connected with the Committee on War Claims we have had bills before us for the purpose of giving relief, I suppose, like that proposed in this bill.

And if we intend to pay in one case we ought to pay in all. The House and the committee ought not to take favorable action in this case without being fully informed both as to its merits and the effect it would have as a precedent. It does not occur to me that there is any great amount of merit in claims of this sort for the benefit of persons so remote from the men who actually rendered the service. I am not aware that the revolutionary officers themselves in their life-time ever claimed anything after they received the commutation that the law gave them in lieu of the half pay of the five years, or whatever the number of years may have been. Therefore I think this bill ought not to pass.

Mr. MACKEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. What is the amount of pay involved in this bill?

Mr. EDEN. I do not know what amount is involved in this particular bill, because I have not made the calculation. But I do know the amount involved in a bill pending before the Committee on War Claims at this time to pay the heirs of these revolutionary officers the full half pay that had been once promised to them, and which was afterward commuted by a gross sum and paid to the officers at their request and received by them. I do know that if that bill is enacted into a law it will take an amount variously estimated at from five to twenty-five millions of dollars.

Mr. THOMPSON rose.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Does the gentleman say that these officers accepted the commutation in full?

Mr. EDEN. I so understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] has the floor.

Mr. EDEN. I had not quite got through. I yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. THOMPSON. The bill under consideration proposes by special legislation to reach one out of probably a hundred cases embraced in the general bill now before the Committee on War Claims and which has been submitted to me as a subcommittee. I have not yet had time to investigate the matter fully; but from my observations heretofore made it will involve a very intricate examination and a very considerable amount of money should the bill be reported favorably and passed.

I believe, in answer to my colleague's question, that the commutation was received by these officers in full of all claims upon the Government; but it is insisted now, and probably fairly, that they did it at a certain time under the pressure of circumstances they could not very well then resist; and now their representatives want, not as a legal right but as an equitable claim against the Government, compensation for rights they legally waived and in full of which they were legally paid.

I do not propose to judge this bill in advance; but my objection to it now is there is no reason known to me why this should be a special case and why it should not stand with kindred claims which are identical in every feature and for which the general bill fully provides. If the general bill is a good one, this claim will be paid; if it is not a good one, this claim should not be paid. And therefore I join the gentleman from Illinois in requesting that this bill be postponed and no favorable action had upon it for the present until the general bill is fully considered.

Mr. MACKEY. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMPSON. With pleasure.

Mr. MACKEY. Will the gentleman state what is the amount involved in this particular bill?

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not know.

Mr. MACKEY. The amount is about $4,200. It has been said that this is an old claim. It is true it is an old claim, but its merits are equal to its age.

Mr. THOMPSON. My objection to the bill is not that it may not be a good bill; I do not know but it is. My objection is this: there are hundreds of claims like this all embodied in one general bill now under consideration; and if this one bill is to be considered as a specialty then every other single and individual bill embraced in the general bill ought on the same ground also to be considered. I say, Mr. Chairman, let them all stand together or fall together. There is no distinction between them and there should be none in the treatment of them by the House.

Mr. MACKEY. I desire to have read a communication from the claimant.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 13, 1877.

GENTLEMEN: A bill is now pending before your honorable body for the relief of the heirs of the late Brigadier-General William Thompson, of the revolutionary army. I have been in Washington many years endeavoring to obtain from Congress an appropriation to pay the amount the heirs consider was due grandfather for his services and his sufferings in the war for the independence of our country. My father died while endeavoring to secure relief from Congress for the same purpose. While here prosecuting this claim I have been compelled by destitution to act as nurse and in other menial capacities to earn my bread. The other heirs are all as poor as I am.

Grandfather gave his money, his time, his health, and finally his life, to his country for its independence. Little did he think that when the nation for which he sacrificed so much was celebrating its centennial in the grandest manner ever known in the history of the world, his descendants would be starving in the streets of Washington, waiting for the pitiful pay promised to him and the other devoted patriots of the Revolution. Grandfather was very wealthy. The records of Congress will show that he paid his regiment while in captivity out of his own pocket; that he left a luxurious home and suffered the torture of a British prison; that he did all that man could do to obtain the benefits of independence which all the Representatives in Congress are now enjoying. He did not even ask during his life for repayment of the money advanced by him to his troops for food, clothing, and other necessaries, and doubtless intended making that a present to his country. The annals of Congress will show that it was asked for by his executor and paid years after his death. I do not come, gentlemen, asking charity or a gratuity. I only ask you to carry out in good faith the pledges of your predecessors in Congress, and pay to the heirs of General Thompson, who are so needy and deserving, the money which he so hardly earned, and which has been paid to five hundred representatives of officers having the same claim. I pray you to report the bill favorably now before you, which gives me nothing more than what has been given to others, and ask its passage; and in this, the one hundred and first year of our Independence, you will have the satisfaction of knowing that you have not only done an act of justice but also one that will entitle you to the grateful prayers of the poor heirs of a gallant revolutionary soldier.

FANNIE A. THOMPSON.

To the honorable COMMITTEE ON REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS
in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BANNING. Is there a report accompanying this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. There is; a somewhat lengthy one.

Mr. BANNING. Let it be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report. Before he concluded the reading,

Mr. BRAGG said: I move that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, and that the reading of the seventh volume of Bancroft's History of the United States be substituted.

Mr. MACKEY. I object.

The Clerk continued and concluded the reading of the report, which is as follows:

Mr. MACKEY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 934) for the relief of the heirs of Brigadier-General William Thompson, of the revolutionary army, having had the same under consideration, submit the petition of one of the heirs herewith as part of their report:

"To the honorable Committee on Revolutionary Pensions,
"House of Representatives:

"Your petitioner incloses two Senate and one House committee reports favorable to her claim for seven years' half-pay due her grandfather, General William Thompson, of the revolutionary army.

"The claim is now brought under the resolutions of Congress of May 15, 1778, August 24, 1780, and June 3, 1784, and your attention is asked to the following statement:

"Robert C. Thompson, administrator, and grandchild of General William Thompson, brought the claim by bill in the Senate in 1854. It was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported favorably, and passed the Senate July 7, 1854. Senator Cooper, in his speech on this bill, (see Congressional Globe, volume 28, page 1622, part 3,) indorsed General Thompson's claim in the strongest manner as just and equitable. It passed by a yea-and-nay vote, 22 for to 12 against, after debate.

"In the House the claim was referred to the Court of Claims for decision. On the 15th of December, 1857, the court reported that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations, (see C. Cls. R., volume 2, Thirty-fifth Congress, first session, page 2,) but admitted the justice and equity of the claim.

"The Committee on Revolutionary Claims in the House, May 29, 1858, reported that this claim, having just merits, the statute of limitations ought never in justice to preclude it from a fair hearing and an honorable settlement, and reported a bill for its payment. Before the House acted on this bill the Thirty-fifth Congress expired, and before the meeting of next Congress the claimant died. The claim is now brought by his daughter, Fannie A. Thompson, who is administratrix de bonis non.

"Your petitioner humbly states that General Thompson's heirs are very poor; that but recently one of them has been buried by charity; that her father died while endeavoring to obtain what is due from the Government, and she has spent many years and all her money in the hope of obtaining relief. General Thompson paid his regiment out of his own pocket when they were in captivity. (See Journal of Congress, volume 2, pages 168, 169.) He loaned money to his State and the United States to aid the patriot cause. He died wealthy, and his relatives did not present his claim to Congress until forced to do so by poverty.

"Your petitioner merely asks now that Congress will not discriminate against General Thompson, but will grant his heirs the same relief it has extended to fifteen hundred similar cases.

"Your attention is called to some few precedents:

"Dr. S. J. Axson (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 6, p. 494, act June 15, 1832,) allowed five years' full pay as surgeon, and interest.

"Robert H. Harrison, allowed five years' full pay as lieutenant-colonel. (Act May 29, 1830, vol. 6, U. S. Stats. at L., p. 437.) Allowed interest by act July 14, 1832. (Vol. 6, p. 524.)

"Thomas Davenport allowed five years' full pay as captain, with interest. (Vol. 6, p. 518, act July 14, 1832.)

"John Thornton allowed five years' full pay as colonel, with interest. (Vol. 6, p. 533, act February 9, 1833.)

"Peter Foster allowed five years' full pay as lieutenant, with interest. (Act of March 2, 1833, p. 540, vol. 6.)

"John Thomas allowed five years' full pay as captain, with interest. (Act March 2, 1833.)

"Thomas H. Baird, surgeon, given five years' full pay and interest. (Act August 15, 1856, Stats. at L., vol. 11, p. 467.)

"James B. Stafford, lieutenant in the Navy, allowed seven years' half pay under the present laws of Congress. (Vol. 17 Stats. at L., p. 681, act June 8, 1872.)

"The attention of the committee is earnestly invited to the case of Dr. Thomas H. Baird, reported in the first Court of Claims, 1855-'56, pages 62, 63. This case was paid two years after General Thompson's case had passed the Senate.

"Hon. Montgomery Blair, solicitor of the United States, argued that the acts passed giving half pay and interest to revolutionary officers conferred a gratuity and could not be enforced. The opinion of the court was 'that it was not a gratuity but a contract.'

"'It was a right earned by meritorious services, and conferred upon him in consideration of the sacrifice of his time and talents for the good of the cause which all had at heart. The law giving interest was a voluntary contract on the part of the United States, which no subsequent legislation could release without the assent of the other party.

"'It may be added that up to the year 1837 there was paid interest on 1,510 claims of officers for personal services, the statutes of limitations as to such claims having been suspended.'

"The principles governing this case are identical with those of General Thompson's, and your petitioner humbly prays that you will pass the bill now before your body, without any amendment, as a matter of justice to the heirs.

"FANNIE A. THOMPSON,
"Administratrix de Bonis Non."

[Senate report No. 201, Forty-first Congress, second session.]

"JUNE 3, 1870.—Ordered to be printed. Mr. Fowler made the following report, to accompany bill S. No. 967:

"The Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs of Brigadier-General Thompson, having had the same under consideration, report:

"That William Thompson, of Pennsylvania, was, on the 1st of March, 1776, chosen by Congress a brigadier-general in the Continental service in the war of the Revolution, and directed by Congress to repair to New York. (See Journals 1776, vol. 1, page 277.) This appointment was announced to him from Philadelphia, March 2, 1776, with the following letters of the above date:

"'SIR: The Congress, from a sense of your merit and zeal in the American cause, have been induced to appoint you a brigadier-general in the Continental Army. I do myself the honor of inclosing your commission, and shall only add that I have it in charge from Congress to direct that you repair as soon as possible to New York, there to join the Continental troops under the command of General Lee.

"'I am, sir, &c.'

"On the 27th of March, 1776, General Washington writes from Cambridge as follows:

"'SIR: Lord Sterling, in his letter of the 20th instant, has informed me of your arrival in New York to take command of the army there.

"'I take this opportunity of congratulating you on your promotion, and am vastly pleased that the Congress have anticipated my application in your favor, which was dated on the 7th instant. I have now to inform you that the fleet have, within a very few hours, left Nantucket Road, and on the morrow another brigade will march from here under the command of General Sullivan. I will, with the main body, march to your assistance very soon, if nothing occurs, which I cannot at present forsee.

"'I am, with great regard, sir, your most humble servant,

"'GEORGE WASHINGTON.

"'General THOMPSON.

"'P. S.—General Putnam will set off to-morrow or next day, and if General Schuyler is absent, will take command of the troops.'

"Under date of a letter from the commissioners sent to Canada, at Montreal, of the 27th of May, 1776, to General Thompson, he is requested to attend a council of war at Chambly, of Thursday following, and to inform him that on that morning a firing of small-arms and cannon was heard toward Fort Saint Ann's, at the extremity of the island of Montreal, and hoped that the enemy would be intercepted in their retreat and our prisoners recovered.

"On the preceding day (May 26) General Arnold wrote to General Thompson as follows:

"'LACHINE, May 26, 1776.

"'DEAR GENERAL: I am much obliged to you for your agreeable favor of the 22d, and kind offer of coming to my assistance. With 450 men, which I now have, when joined by Colonel De Haaes, I believe we shall be a match for the enemy. By the best information I can obtain, they are 500 or 600 strong. Their advance-guard was at Point Claire (three leagues above this) last night, and gave out that they intended to attack us this morning. We are well prepared to receive them.

"'I heartily condole with you the loss of poor Major Sherbaup. I am told his party fought well, and many were killed. I cannot learn if he is among the number. Our prisoners are at Saint Ann's, and used well. I hope by sending up a strong party by water to cut off the retreat of the enemy and to retake our prisoners; at the same time, I intend to attack their main body here. I hope soon to transmit you a more favorable account of matters here.

"'I am, with great esteem and affection, your obedient humble servant,

"'B. ARNOLD.

"'General THOMPSON.'

"Instructions to General Thompson.

"'DEAR SIR: You are to march as soon as possible with Colonel Irvine and Colonel Wayne's regiments, together with those of Colonel St. Clair, now remaining at this place, and join Colonel St. Clair at Nicholett, and take command of the whole party; and unless you find the number of the enemy at Three Rivers to be such as would render all hazardous, attack upon them. You will pay particular attention to the preservation of your batteaux, keeping them at a convenient distance above the shipping, which lies at or near Three Rivers.

"'I would by no means advise you to attack if the prospect of success is not much in your favor, as a defeat of your party at this time might prove the total loss of this country. Sir, as I have (without flattery) the highest opinion of the bravery and good conduct of yourself and the officers you command, I forbear attempting particular instructions, being well assured that neither prudence nor resolution will be wanting to answer the great purpose we have in view. I have the highest opinion of the bravery and resolution of the troops you command, and doubt not but under the direction of a kind Providence you will open the way for our recovering that ground which former troops have so shamefully lost. Wishing you the greatest safety and success,

"'I am, dear sir, your obedient servant,

"'JOHN SULLIVAN,
"'Commander of the Continental Forces in Canada.

"'Brigadier-General THOMPSON.

"'June 6, 1776, (Thursday.) Sundry letters were laid before Congress and read. One from Brigadier-General Thompson, of the 25th of said month, (May,) to the commissioners. (See Journals, vol. 1, page 366.)

"'Two thousand of their best men, headed by General Thompson, embarked at the Sorel and fell down with the tide, keeping on the south side of the river till they arrived at a place called Nicholett, opposite to Three Rivers. * * * Unfortunately for their design, the time they took in crossing the river was so long that, though they passed the shipping unobserved, they were discovered at their landing. The alarm being given, General Frazier prepared to meet them. * * * The provincial commander was taken with about two-hundred of his men.' (See Andrews American War, vol. 2, pages 165, 166, and 167.)'

"The following is an abstract from a letter from General Thompson to Major Scull, dated at Quebec Harbor, August 3, 1776, while he was a prisoner:

"'Through the great humanity of his excellency General Carlton, all the prisoners in Canada are allowed to return to the Colonies on their parole, and will embark for New York this day or to-morrow.

"'In Congress, August 6, 1776: "Resolved, That General Schuyler be directed to apply to General Burgoyne and propose a general exchange of prisoners on the terms agreed on by Congress, and particularly the delivering Brigadier-General Prescott, in possession of the United States, in lieu of Brigadier-General Thompson, in the possession of the enemy." (Journals, volume 1, page 434.)

"'In Congress, November 23, 1776: "Resolved, That General Washington be directed to propose to General Howe an exchange of William Franklin, esq., late governor of New Jersey, for Brigadier-General Thompson."

"'In Congress, December 3, 1776: "Resolved, That General Washington be directed, in case he has not entered into a negotiation with General Howe for exchanging Governor Franklin for General Thompson, to suspend the execution of that matter till further orders."'

"The following is an extract from a letter written by General Thompson to Major Scull, dated at Carlisle, January 17, 1777:

"'As I can't learn that there are any hopes of my being exchanged shortly, and I don't like to go to camp before I am at liberty to act, I have inclosed you my account from my leaving New York to my return to the Colonies. * * * If I am to remain a prisoner, I would advise you to push for promotion in one of the Pennsylvania regiments.'

"The last letter from General Thompson bears date June 4, 1781, at Carlisle, and would indicate that he had not yet been exchanged; and if he had been, or had been dropped from the service previous to his death, the records would doubtless show it.

"The certificate of the Third Auditor is:

"'The records of the revolutionary war in that office afford no evidence when General Thompson went into service, or the date of his death, or that he was on parole and never exchanged; but afford evidence, however, that he was in the service, and that funds were placed in his hands to pay the officers and soldiers of his command who returned from captivity, and his own pay and rations to the 1st of August, 1780, &c. But his seven years' half pay is not found to have been included in the settlement. As his death did not transpire until the 3d of September, 1781, it is obvious there could be no settlement of the seven years' half pay then.'

"RESOLUTION IN CONGRESS, AUGUST 24, 1780.

"'Resolved, That the resolution of the 15th of May, 1778, granting half pay for seven years to the officers of the Army who should continue in service to the end of the war, be extended to the widows of those officers who have died, or shall hereafter die, in the service; to commence from the time of such officer's death, and continue for the term of seven years; or if there be no widow, or in case of her death or intermarriage, the said half pay be given to the orphan children of the officer dying as aforesaid, if he shall have left any; and that it recommend to the Legislatures of the respective States to which such officers belong to make provisions for paying the same on account of the United States.'

"It is proper that the committee should state that none of the testimony hereinbefore referred to was filed or made evidence before the Court of Claims, and which was not deemed necessary, or was accessible at that time, except the brief of the attorney for the claimants, which cited to history and the journals of Congress. But it appears there was other evidence filed which your committee deemed pertinent, and some deficiencies filed since, namely, that Catherine Thompson, before named, was the widow of Brigadier-General William Thompson, and that she never remarried, and died the widow of said General Thompson, in December, 1809.

"In the testimony filed in the original application is the declaration of John Johnston, in whose favor the court, before whom he made his declaration, declare their opinion that he was a revolutionary soldier, and that he served as he stated. He states that he was a private in Colonel Irvine's regiment, Pennsylvania Line, and was in the battle of the Three Rivers, in Canada, about fifty miles from Quebec; that in the month of June, 1776, they were attacked by the British and defeated, and that General Thompson and Colonel Irvine were both taken prisoners.

"Mary Thompson, who is certified to be a person of good repute, testifies that she was personally acquainted with General William Thompson, and married his eldest son, on the 20th July, 1786, and that General Thompson died a prisoner, September 3, 1781.

"It appears from proper certificates from the state department of Pennsylvania that neither the widow nor the heirs of General Thompson have ever received the seven years' half pay promised by the foregoing resolution.

"The court says:

"'There is no doubt but that General Thompson is a brigadier-general in the Continental army of the Revolution, and that he died before the end of the war, namely, about the 3d of September, 1781. It may also be considered, though the point is not clear, that he was in the service at the time of his death; * * * but, independently of these defects (defects since cured) the case is barred by statute of limitation.'

"The Committee on Revolutionary Claims in the House reported a bill on the 29th day of May, 1858, in favor of the payment of the seven years' half pay, notwithstanding the decision of the Court of Claims, which bill was not acted on before the adjournment of the Thirty-fifth Congress; and before the next Congress could take action upon it, the claimant died, and the war of 1861 coming on soon after, the case has gone until now, when the present claimant, Fannie A. Thompson, great-grandchild and administratrix de bonis non, appears by petition, and proves her right to what Congress had before almost given her father. Your committee therefore report a bill granting the seven years' half pay, promised by said resolution of Congress, as brigadier-general in the Continental army, to Fannie A. Thompson, and recommend its passage."

But it appears there was other evidence filed which your committee deem pertinent, and some deficiencies filed since, namely, that Catharine Thompson, before named, was the widow of Brigadier-General William Thompson, and that she never remarried, and died the widow of said General Thompson in December, 1809.

"In the testimony filed in the original application is the declaration of John Johnston, in whose favor the court, before whom he made his declaration, declare their opinion that he was a revolutionary soldier, and that he served as he stated. He states that he was a private in Colonel Irvine's regiment, Pennsylvania Line, and was in the battle of the Three Rivers, in Canada, about fifty miles from Quebec; and that in the month of June, 1776, they were attacked by the British and defeated, and that General Thompson and Colonel Irvine were both taken prisoners.

"Mary Thompson, who is certified to be a person of good repute, testifies that she was personally acquainted with General William Thompson, and married his eldest son on the 20th of July, 1786, and that General Thompson died a prisoner, September 3, 1781.

"It appears from proper certificates from the state department of Pennsylvania that neither the widow nor the heirs of General Thompson have ever received the seven years' half pay promised by the foregoing resolution.

"The Committee on Revolutionary Claims in the House reported a bill on the 29th day of May, 1858, in favor of the payment of the seven years' half pay, which bill was not acted upon before the adjournment of the Thirty-fifth Congress, and before the next Congress could take action upon it the claimant died, and the war of 1861 coming on soon after, the case has gone on till now, when the present claimant, Fannie A. Thompson, great-grandchild and administratrix de bonis non, appears by petition and proves her right to what Congress had before almost given her father. Your committee therefore report a bill granting the seven years' half pay, promised by said resolution of Congress as brigadier-general in the Continental army, to Fannie A. Thompson, and recommend its passage."

[House report, No. 457, Forty-fourth Congress, first session.]

"MAY 4, 1876.—Committed to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed. Mr. DAVIS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, submitted the following report, (to accompany bill H. R. No. 1678:)

"The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1638) for the relief of the heirs of Brigadier-General William Thompson, of the revolutionary army, having had the same under consideration, report:

"That William Thompson was a brigadier-general in the Continental service in the war of the Revolution.

"By a resolution of Congress, adopted on the 15th of May, 1778, it was provided 'that all officers commissioned by Congress, who now are, or who may hereafter be, in the service of the United States, and shall continue therein during the war, shall, after the conclusion of the war, receive annually, for seven years, if they live so long, one-half the present pay of such officers.'

"By a resolution adopted August 24, 1780, it was declared 'that the resolution of the 15th day of May, 1778, granting half pay for seven years to the officers of the army who should continue in the service to the end of the war, be extended to the widows of those officers who have died, or who shall hereafter die, in its service, to commence from the time of such officer's death and continue for the term of seven years; or if there be no widow, or in the case of her death or intermarriage, the said half pay be given to the orphan children of the officer dying as aforesaid, if he shall have left any, and that it recommend to the Legislatures of the respective States, to which such officers belong, to make provisions for paying the same on account of the United States.'

"This claim is based upon these resolutions of Congress, and was first brought by Robert C. Thompson, administrator and a grandchild of General William Thompson, in 1854, and a bill was introduced into the Senate allowing the claim. This bill was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported upon favorably by the committee, and passed the Senate. In the House it was referred to the Court of Claims for a report. From the report of the Court of Claims and the evidence, it fully appears that William Thompson was a brigadier-general in the revolutionary war, and that he died in service (or a prisoner on parole) in 1780, and that he left a wife and children, who have since died, leaving children.

"The court say that there was no evidence before them that Catharine Thompson was the widow of General Thompson, nor did it appear before the court that she lived unmarried seven years after his death, or for any specified period after that event, or that she died or married again before the expiration of the seven years.

"There is evidence, which was not before the Court of Claims, which shows that Catharine Thompson was the widow of General Thompson, and that she remained and died his widow in 1809, but the court say that 'independently of any defects in the evidence, the claim is barred by the statute of limitations,' and that the claimants have no cause of action. Notwithstanding this report of the Court of Claims the House Committee on Revolutionary Claims reported a bill on the 29th May, 1858, in favor of the payment of the seven years' half pay. This bill was not acted upon, and no action was taken by the next Congress.

"Robert Thompson died, and the claim was revived before the Forty-first Congress by the petition of Fannie Thompson, a great-grandchild and administratrix de bonis non. On the 3d June, 1870, the Senate Committee on Revolutionary Claims made a report, accompanied by a bill granting seven years' half pay, and recommending its passage. This was not acted upon.

"Application was again made to the Forty-second Congress, and on the 30th May, 1872, the Senate Committee on Revolutionary Claims reported again in favor of the claim, accompanying the report by a bill granting seven years' half pay. This was not acted upon.

"There is no explanation of the long delay in the presentation of this claim, and the present bill only asks that the Court of Claims be authorized and directed to adjudicate the claim upon its merits, without regard to the statute of limitations, authorizing the court to use the evidence heretofore taken.

"The application to be allowed to be heard before the Court of Claims upon the merits seems to the committee reasonable, and they recommend the passage of the bill with a proviso that in no event shall more than the principal that may be found due upon such claim be allowed, and the bill is reported back so amended, with the recommendation that it do pass."

The statement of the heirs as to the passage of the bill for their relief by the Senate in 1854 and the subsequent progress of the claim is verified by the records of Congress and the Court of Claims. The precedents quoted are also found to be correct.

The bill in effect simply asks that the statute of limitations, which Congress has suspended in over fifteen hundred cases of precisely the same nature, may be removed so that General Thompson's claim may be adjudicated and settled by the proper officers of the Treasury Department upon the same principles the others have been.

In view of the fact that in every instance where bills for the relief of these heirs have been before Congress favorable reports have been made, (five reports;) that the Senate passed a bill for claimant at one session and the House at another; that it is twenty-three years since the Senate passed its bill, (1854;) that the first claimant died urging the claim; that the present claimant has been petitioning Congress for sixteen years for relief; that the heirs are in destitute circumstances; that Congress has passed bills recently for similar claims; that General Thompson's services during the war for Independence were so "zealous and meritorious" as to elicit the thanks of General Washington and promotion by Congress, and that he died a prisoner of war, your committee report that in their judgment the heirs are entitled to the relief asked for, and in the language of the report of the committee of this House upon the bill for the relief of General Thompson's heirs, May 29, 1858, recommend the passage of the present bill:

"The claim having just merits, the statute of limitations ought never in justice to preclude it from a fair hearing and honorable settlement."

Mr. EDEN. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported adversely to the House.

The question being put, there were—ayes 75, noes 22.

Mr. FRANKLIN. A quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. FRANKLIN, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. BAKER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 20.

So (further count not being insisted on) the motion was agreed to, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with an adverse recommendation.

SURETIES OF THE LATE JESSE J. SIMKINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 186) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia, reported by Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GOODE. Since that bill was reported the parties for whose relief it was intended have made an arrangement with the Government which is satisfactory. They have paid a certain amount which has been accepted in full; and I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY M. MEADE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 138) for the relief of Henry M. Meade, late paymaster in the United States Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department be, and are hereby, authorized to adjust the accounts of Henry M. Meade, late a paymaster in the United States Navy, and credit him with the sum of $2,545.22, for unavoidable losses and checkages sustained by him in the legitimate performance of his duties as paymaster in the United States Navy, from 1862 to 1872, which sum stands now charged against him at the United States Treasury Department.

Mr. DIBRELL. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The said Henry M. Meade was paymaster, United States Navy, from January 31, 1862, to February 23, 1872, more than ten years, during more than three years of which war existed. During this period of war he was stationed part of the time as assistant paymaster on the receiving-ship North Carolina, in the port of New York, and part in the sounds of North Carolina, on board the Mattabesett, as paymaster, distributing stores to other vessels which had not paymasters, and acting also as chief of powder division; all of these positions being of extraordinary responsibility, often without adequate accommodation, and compelled to employ agents of whom he could know but little, and therefore unusually liable to loss occasioned by the confusion incident to the character of the service in which those vessels were engaged. During the remainder of this term of service, seven years, he was almost constantly assigned to active service. Notwithstanding the embarrassments under which said Meade discharged a large part of his arduous and responsible duties, the large sums received and disbursed, and the vast stores distributed by him were satisfactorily accounted for, except the small sum, comparatively, of $2,555.43, in items so small as to show the almost impossibility of avoiding such losses in so large a business consisting of transactions so small. The items of loss are as follows:

Unavoidable losses on clothing and small stores from 1862 to 1872	$1,052 53
Sustained on payments from 1862 to 1872	556 20
In a sale of condemned beef	87 97
In coffee stolen	49 98
Erroneous checkage by Paymaster James Fulton	93 42
Erroneous checkage by Charles Stewart	100 00
Amount overdrawn by W. S. Huddell, paymaster's clerk	425 33
Amount due by Commander T. H. Eastman, United States Navy	190 00
Total	2,555 43

Excepting the last four months of this long and arduous service, when it was the misfortune of Mr. Meade to fall suddenly into habits of dissipation, caused by domestic concern, during which period no part of this loss occurred, his conduct deserved the very highest commendation of his commanding and associate officers and of others with whom he held official relations, as is evinced by the testimonials herewith submitted, sustaining his character for capacity, zeal, industry, and integrity, and from the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury for the promptness and accuracy with which his accounts were rendered, who sees no impropriety in passing a bill for his relief.

Mr. KIMMEL. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COVERT reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Private Calandar, and had instructed him to report sundry bills; some with a favorable and some with an unfavorable recommendation.

JESSE J. SIMKINS.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. No. 186) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, by Mr. HARRIS of Virginia, with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken; and the bill was recommitted to the committee.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted to the committee; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRY M. MEADE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill

(H. R. No. 138) for the relief of Henry M. Meade, late paymaster in the United States Navy, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs by Mr. KIMMEL, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KIMMEL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL WILLIAM THOMPSON.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. No. 934) for the relief of the heirs of Brigadier-General William Thompson, of the revolutionary army, reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions by Mr. MACKEY, with the recommendation that it do not pass.

The bill was laid on the table.

Mr. EDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU.

Mr. BOONE. It will be remembered that at the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress a joint commission was appointed on the part of the Senate and House of Representatives to take into consideration the expediency of transferring the management of the Indian Bureau to the War Department. At a meeting of the committee after our investigation upon the subject we were unable to agree upon a majority report.

Mr. CONGER. Is this a privileged matter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is, in view of the fact that the law directed that the report should be made, and in view of the further fact that under such a construction of the law a report has been made in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. CONGER. This is a public bill and this is private bill day.

The SPEAKER. There is no private business intervening and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CONGER. This is a report from a commission.

The SPEAKER. The House seems to have disposed of all the private business it desired to do and the Chair desires to recognize both gentlemen who have the respective reports from the Indian commission.

Mr. CONGER. The House has set apart to-night and to-morrow night for the consideration of private bills. If in fact we have no private business this evening we might as well adjourn.

The SPEAKER. There is no private business presenting itself by any motion at this time and hence the Chair under the rule is authorized to entertain public business, and the Chair will feel compelled to recognize the gentleman from Kentucky for the reason that the law compels the commission to report to the House before the month closes.

Mr. CONGER. Well, the month is closed.

The SPEAKER. No, we are on the last day of the month.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. BOONE. The gentleman cannot take me off the floor. I had not yielded for any such purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HALE. Supposing that the House should take a recess, could anything but private business be done this evening?

The SPEAKER. Nothing can be done except under the terms of the order.

Mr. HALE. Do not the terms of the order exclude everything but private business?

The SPEAKER. The session for this evening is for the consideration of the Private Calendar, as if on objection day.

Mr. HALE. Does not that exclude all public business?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. MILLS. Was not to-night set apart for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures?

The SPEAKER. No; that is Friday the 7th of February.

Mr. HALE. Under the order made, can the House get itself into such a condition that anything else but private business can be done?

The SPEAKER. It cannot.

Mr. BURCHARD. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] claims the right to make this report, because the law requires that it shall be made before the 1st of February.

The SPEAKER. The law requires that the report shall be made before to-morrow.

Mr. BURCHARD. Is it a committee or commission?

The SPEAKER. It is a commission.

Mr. BURCHARD. Well, then, they can send their report to the Speaker and he can lay it before the House, but it seems to me that no member of a commission can claim the floor to make a report. They must send their report to the Speaker, and it must be laid before the House by him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kentucky could do that, and that the report could be presented through the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot understand how the commission has any right on this floor except through the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The commission is composed of members of Congress, and it is to report to Congress before its term expires. The bill for the reorganization of the Army was reported in the same way.

Mr. BURCHARD. We would have no objection to having the report laid before the House through the Speaker; but if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] claims the right to report a bill for the action of the House——

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. Under the resolution creating this commission——

The SPEAKER. It was a law which created the commission.

Mr. HOOKER. I proposed to quote the law. That law required the commission to report on or before the 1st day of January, 1879. By the action of the House and of the Senate the time was extended until the 1st day of February, 1879. Therefore to-day is the last day on which this commission can make its report under the law. By reference to the law authorizing this commission, and prescribing their duties and the time within which they should perform them, there will be found this provision:

Said committee shall be authorized to send for persons and papers, to employ a clerk and stenographer, and to sit during the recess of Congress. It shall be the duty of said committee to make final report on or before the 1st day of January, 1879.

By action of the House and the Senate the time was extended to the 1st day of February, and after to-day they will have no time in which to make a report.

Mr. BURCHARD. The very provision which the gentleman has read shows that the commission has no more right to rise on this floor to make a report here than the Secretary of the Treasury has.

The SPEAKER. The same course was pursued in regard to the bill for the reorganization of the Army, which was provided for in the same law.

Mr. CONGER. But no objection was made to that, and there is to this.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. This commission is composed of members of the House.

Mr. BURCHARD. And members of the Senate also.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; and there is no law which can deprive any member of this House of any right which he may possess under the rules.

Mr. BURCHARD. Or to give him any additional right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he has come to an understanding with both sides upon this question, so that the two sides may present their views to-day. After the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] shall have submitted the views he desires to submit, the Chair will then immediately recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN VORHES] to submit the views of the other side.

Mr. BURCHARD. What action is proposed to be had upon the report?

The SPEAKER. No action, as the Chair understands.

Mr. BURCHARD. What is proposed to be done with it?

The SPEAKER. Have it printed.

Mr. BURCHARD. If they simply desire to submit their report and have it printed, that can be done through the Chair.

A MEMBER. And recommitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no desire to recommit the report.

Mr. BOONE. We do not want to recommit it. We simply desire to bring the report before the House and have it printed.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair understands and has stated.

Mr. CONGER. Pending that, I move that the House now take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn takes precedence.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 76, noes 65.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. BRIGHT said: I call for tellers. This evening's session has been set apart by order of the House for the consideration of the Private Calendar. I hope the motion to adjourn will be voted down.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MILLS and Mr. BRIGHT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 78.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose my motion for a recess now comes up.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion and allow this report to be made.

Mr. CONGER. I insist upon the motion.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 42, noes 96.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CONGER called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHITE of Pennsylvania. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are called for upon the motion for a recess.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is not my motion in order pending that call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain it.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to; upon a division, ayes 10, noes not counted.

Mr. CONGER. Now let the count on the motion for a recess be finished.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the yeas and nays upon the motion for a recess.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being but 3 in the affirmative.

So the motion for a recess was not agreed to.

Mr. BOONE. I was proceeding to state that the commission were unable to agree on a report; they were equally divided in sentiment on this question. It was expressly understood and agreed in the committee that each side—those favoring and those opposed to the transfer—should present to the different Houses their views upon this question by way of a report. In accordance with that agreement I now ask to file a report, and move that it be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I demand that it be read.

Mr. SCALES. Before that is done let the report from the other side come in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the report on the other side be allowed to come in, and then, if necessary, both reports can be read.

Mr. VAN VORHES. On behalf of those members of the committee who take a different view from that presented in the report of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] I submit an adverse report, and ask that both reports may go together and be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked that the report of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN VORHES] be received before acting on the request of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] because the Chair had obligated himself to recognize the gentleman from Ohio for this purpose.

Mr. CONGER. Before the question is taken on ordering the printing I ask that both reports be read.

Mr. MILLS, and Mr. WHITE of Pennsylvania, moved that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. These reports are presented merely for printing, not for reference at all.

Mr. EDEN. Under what rule has a single member the right to demand the reading of these papers?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I have submitted a motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is about to have a rule read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Where papers are laid before the House or referred to a committee every member has a right to have them once read at the table before he can be compelled to vote on them.

The SPEAKER. This is not a motion requiring a member to vote upon these reports, under the terms and spirit of the rule.

Mr. CONGER. Is not this a motion to print?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the House make an order for printing.

Mr. CONGER. So I supposed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair proposes to submit that question to the House.

Mr. CONGER. When that is submitted, then I will ask that the reports be read.

The question being put, the Speaker declared the motion agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. On that question I demand a division; and pending that demand I ask that the reports be read.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House take a recess till half past seven o'clock in accordance with the order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan demands a division upon the question of printing.

Mr. CONGER. And pending that demand I ask that the reports be read.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, there were—ayes 66, noes 69.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, and others, called for tellers.

Mr. PRICE. I move that the House take a recess till half past seven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. If the House should adjourn or take a recess the motion to print will come up as unfinished business; and when it again comes up the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan to demand the reading of the reports.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House take a recess till half past seven o'clock.

Mr. MILLS. Will not the motion to print come up as unfinished business if the House should adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It will. If the House should take a recess it will not come up this evening for the reason that to-night has been set apart by order of the House for particular business.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I have called for tellers on the motion to adjourn.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. SCALES were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 57.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 67, nays 83, not voting 138; as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I am paired with Mr. THOMPSON on this subject.

Mr. SAMPSON. My colleague, Mr. BURDICK, is paired with Mr. BENEDICT. Mr. BURDICK would vote "no."

Mr. BRIGGS. I am paired with Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. If he were present, I would vote "no."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. KNAPP, is paired with Mr. MORGAN.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I object.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I think that dispensing with the reading of names will not be objected to now. I move they be dispensed with.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object. If gentlemen want to stay here, why let them.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock, in pursuance of previous order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have read (so members may understand fully the question of order before they meet again, as this question will come up as unfinished business to-morrow) the general parliamentary interpretation from Jefferson's Manual on this point, which is made part of the rules of this House when not inconsistent with specific rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION XXXII.—READING PAPERS.

Where papers are laid before the House or referred to a committee, every member has a right to have them once read at the table before he can be compelled to vote on them; but it is a great though common error to suppose that he has a right, toties quoties, to have acts, journals, accounts, or papers on the table read independently of the will of the House. The delay and interruption which this might be made to produce evince the impossibility of the existence of such a right. There is, indeed, so manifest a propriety of permitting every member to have as much information as possible on every question on which he is to vote that when he desires the reading, if it be seen that it is really for information and not for delay, the Speaker directs it to be read without putting a question, if no one objects; but if objected to, a question must be put.—2 Hats., 117, 118.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide the point when the House next meets, and the unfinished business is in order.

Mr. WAIT. When private bills come up to-night, and one member objects, will that prevent the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The order of the House will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Friday and Saturday evenings of next week be set apart for the consideration of the Private Calendar, to be considered as objection days.

The SPEAKER. The call of the Private Calendar will commence where it left off last objection day.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say if the Speaker will state what position this report, when printed, will be in—whether it can be brought up on the call of the member reporting it, or what other position it will be in—I would know and the House would know whether they desire to hear it read or not.

The SPEAKER. It is a report which a commission under the law was directed to make, and as it is before the House it will come up on the motion to print; which question is undecided, and consequently unfinished.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that; but suppose it is ordered to be printed and that is disposed of?

Mr. BOONE. That disposes of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not so clear on that point.

Mr. BOONE. That at least is all my motion comprehends.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will look into the question, which is a new one.

Mr. CONGER. That is the only reason why I demanded the reading of the report, so we might know whether this question could be sprung upon the House at any time or not.

The SPEAKER. It could never be sprung upon the House.

Mr. CONGER. I mean whether it could be called up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it has lost its privilege of being considered and would go over as any other subject under the rules of the House to the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. Then I move to amend the pending motion. I withdraw my demand for the reading of the reports.

The SPEAKER. There is a place on the Calendar provided for such reports.

Mr. CONGER. I move the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOONE. I have made the motion that the reports be printed.

Mr. CONGER. And I move the motion be so amended that the reports shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The place where the rule requires it to go. The rule will be read.

Mr. CONGER. It would if it came through the Chair undoubtedly.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from Kentucky says he desires no action, but only that the report shall be received and ordered to be printed. If that be so I presume there will be no further objection.

Mr. CONGER. That is all I want.

Mr. BOONE. That is all my motion comprehends.

The SPEAKER. This is the report of a commission and will go to the Calendar as undisposed of.

Mr. CONGER. Can it be brought up as a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. Only by the usual action under the rules. It has no precedence over any other business now.

Mr. CONGER. If that is its position it meets all I desire, and I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BOONE's motion to print was then agreed to.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House will meet this evening at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

Mr. FRANKLIN. That is if there is a quorum here to take a recess.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House take a recess.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 51.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. ITTNER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 55, not voting 168; as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1108) to protect Holmead's Cemetery, in the District of Columbia.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was read, being to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert:

That all the right and title of the United States to and in square No. 109, in the city of Washington, commonly known as Holmead's Cemetery, be, and the same is hereby, granted to and vested in the District of Columbia, and shall be used by said District for public-school purposes, and for none other. The commissioners of the District, or their successors in office, may at any time sell any part or the whole of said square; but the proceeds of such sale or sales shall be exclusively invested in sites for public schools or in the erection or purchase of school buildings, and shall be used for no other purpose whatever. But before making any disposition of the said square, the District of Columbia shall remove all the bodies remaining interred therein to some suitable burial-ground, together with all tombstones or other monuments remaining at the graves from which the bodies are so removed.

And to amend the title so as to read:

A bill to transfer the title of the United States to square 109 to the District of Columbia for the benefit of public schools thereof.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, communicating further information respecting the plan of a national survey proposed by the National Academy of Sciences.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SARGENT. If the communication, which I did not hear distinctly, relates to the cost of executing surveys I ask that it be printed. Is that the subject-matter?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not. The Chair understands that there is a communication from the Superintendent of the Coast Survey among the papers transmitted.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting five sheets of drawings to accompany the letter from Captain James B. Eads which was forwarded to the Senate on the 27th of January with a report from a board of officers appointed to examine the works in progress of construction at the mouth of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Commissary-General of Subsistence relative to the organization of the Subsistence department as proposed in the bill (S. No. 1491) to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States, and to make rules for its government and regulation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Attorney-General relative to extravagant damages awarded by local juries in the State courts in cases arising out of the Fox and Wisconsin River improvement act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SARGENT. Ought it not to go to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It relates to the Fox and Wisconsin River improvement.

Mr. SARGENT. It refers to the matter of giving jurisdiction to the circuit courts in certain cases named therein.

The communication was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting special estimates of appropriations required for the service of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the memorial of William Coleman & Co., Pope & Talbot, and other firms of San Francisco, California, among whom I recognize the names of many merchants, who style themselves "merchants, ship-owners, and other citizens of the United States," who during the late rebellion paid war premiums to underwriters for insurance against loss in case of destruction or capture by the Alabama or other confederate cruisers. They represent that "the insurance companies having been indemnified for the losses they have been called upon to pay on account of captures or destruction of property by such cruisers, by the extra rates commonly called war premiums, which your memorialists and others have paid, we claim that in justice and in equity so much of the Alabama claims fund as will reimburse the insured citizens of the United States for war premiums so paid, should be applied and disposed of for that purpose; and we respectfully pray Congress to enact such laws as may be necessary to accomplish this end." I believe the legislation appropriate to that prayer has passed the House of Representatives and is now before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. I hope that we shall have a report at this session in time to act upon it. I move the reference of the memorial to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the memorial of Ed. A. Smith, president of the National Cigar Manufacturers' Association, remonstrating against the proposed change in the present method of stamping cigars by attaching a coupon stamp; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of G. Nelson, daughter of and one of the executors of the estate of W. F. Nelson, deceased, late chaplain of the United States Army, praying to be allowed an amount of money equal to the amount of commutation for quarters and rations claimed to be due to her late father while on duty at Washington Park United States hospital at Cincinnati, Ohio, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1746) for the relief of Emma G. Nelson, executrix, and Aaron H. Nelson, executor of the estate of W. F. Nelson, deceased.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR. The minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which committee were referred sundry petitions asking for an amendment of the Constitution forbidding the prohibition of the right of suffrage on account of sex, had leave of the Senate to submit a minority report, which I now present, and I ask that the majority report and the minority report may be printed together.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be entered.

Mr. McCREERY. I present the report of four members of the joint committee appointed by the two Houses of Congress at the last session to take into consideration the expediency of transferring the management of the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department. The committee are equally divided. Four members have already submitted their report, and I now submit the report of the others. I ask that it be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that these two reports be printed in a single volume.

Mr. McCREERY. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be observed.

The Vice-President appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. ANTHONY, and Mr. MCPHERSON.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 6270) for the relief of Joseph B. Collins was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 138) for the relief of Henry M. Meade, late paymaster in the United States Navy, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 1763) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to invest in the bonds of the United States the unexpended balance of the money appropriated to the L'Anse and Vieux de Sert bands of Lake Superior;

A bill (H. R. No. 2633) for the relief of Amanda M. Cook; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4258) for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas, and for other purposes.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 376) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories. This bill was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims on the 6th of December, 1877, and reported with an amendment on the 20th of May, 1878, by myself, under the direction of that committee. As it involves interests important to the United States and to the settlers in sundry southwestern Territories, and as I think it will only occupy a very short time, I ask the Senate to take it up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. VOORHEES. Is not the bill on the Calendar?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is on the Calendar, and was reported on the 20th of May last.

Mr. VOORHEES. We have not yet reached the Calendar in the order of business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; the Calendar comes up at one o'clock.

Mr. VOORHEES. Do I understand the Senator to say that he thinks the consideration of this bill will not take much time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it will not, because it meets the unanimous approval of the committee, and it is a matter of detail and regulation. I had the impression, therefore, that it would probably be disposed of without any serious discussion.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not want to antagonize the Senator's bill, but I simply remind him that there is also upon the Calendar a bill with a report in its favor that was reported to this body eleven months ago, it will now soon be a year. I make no objection to the bill being taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To the request of the Senator from Vermont the Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims with an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Although the amendment is very like in many respects the original bill, as it is a complete redraft, I presume there will be no objection to reading the amendment in place of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute will be treated as the original bill.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims was read, being to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons, or their legal representatives, claiming lands within the limits of the Territory derived by the United States from the Republic of Mexico and now embraced within the Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Arizona, or Utah, or within the States of Nevada or Colorado, by virtue of such lawful Spanish or Mexican grant, concession, warrant, or survey, as the United States are bound to recognize by virtue of the treaties of cession of said country by Mexico to the United States, which, at the date of the passage of this act, have not been confirmed by act of Congress, or otherwise decided upon by lawful authority, in every such case to present a petition, in writing, to the judge of the district court of the United States in a State or Territory for the judicial district in which such lands may be situate, setting forth fully the nature of their claims to the lands, and particularly stating the date and form of the grant, concession, warrant, or order of survey under which they claim, by whom made, the name or names of any person or persons in possession of or claiming the same, or any part thereof, otherwise than by the lease or permission of the petitioner; and, also, the quantity of land claimed, and the boundaries thereof, where situate, with a map showing the same, as near as may be; and whether the said claim has heretofore been confirmed, considered, or acted upon by Congress, or the authorities of the United States, or been heretofore submitted to any authorities constituted by law for the adjustment of land-titles within the limits of the said Territory so acquired, and by them reported on unfavorably or recommended for confirmation, or authorized to be surveyed or not; and praying in such petition that the validity of such title or claim may be inquired into and decided. And the said courts respectively are hereby authorized and required to take and exercise jurisdiction of all cases or claims presented by petition in conformity with the provisions of this act, and to hear and determine the same, as hereinafter provided, on the petition and proofs in case no answer or answers be filed after due notice, or on the petition and the answer or answers of any person or persons interested in preventing any claim from being established, and the answer of the district attorney, where he may have filed an answer, and such testimony and proofs as may be taken; and a copy of such petition, with a citation to any adverse possessor or claimant, shall, immediately after the filing of the same, be served on such possessor or claimant in the ordinary legal manner of serving such process in the proper State or Territory, and in like manner on the district attorney of the United States; and it shall be the duty of the United States attorney for the proper district, as also any adverse possessor or claimant, after service of petition and citation, as hereinbefore provided, within thirty days, unless further time shall, for good cause shown, be granted by the judge or court to whom said petition is presented, to enter an appearance, and plead, answer, or demur to said petition; and in default of such plea, answer, or demurrer being made within said thirty days, or within the further time which may have been granted as aforesaid, the court shall proceed to hear the cause on the petition and proofs, and render a final decree according to the provisions of this act; and in no case shall a decree be entered otherwise than upon full legal proof and hearing; and in every case the court shall require the petition to be sustained by satisfactory proofs, whether an answer or plea shall have been filed or not.

SEC. 2. That all proceedings subsequent to the filing of said petition shall be conducted as near as may be according to the rules of the courts of equity in the proper Territory or court of the United States in the States, except that the answer of the attorney of the United States shall not be required to be verified by his oath, and no continuance shall be granted unless for good cause shown; and the said courts shall have full power and authority to hear and determine all questions arising in said case relative to the title of the claimants, the extent, locality, and boundaries of said claim, or other matters connected therewith, fit and proper to be heard and determined, and by a final decree to settle and determine the question of the validity of the title and the boundaries of the grant or claim presented for adjudication, according to the law of nations, the stipulations of the treaty concluded between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, at the city of Guadalupe Hidalgo, on the 2d day of February, A. D. 1848, or the treaty concluded between the same powers at the City of Mexico, on the 30th day of December, A. D. 1853, and the laws and ordinances of the government from which it is alleged to have been derived, and all other questions properly arising between the claimants or other parties in the case and the United States, which decree shall in all cases refer to the treaty, law, or ordinance under which such claim is confirmed or rejected; and in all cases the party against whom the judgment or decree of said district court may be finally rendered shall be entitled to an appeal to the supreme court of the proper Territory, or if the case be in a United States court in a State to the Supreme Court of the United States, which shall be taken and allowed in the manner now prescribed by law for taking appeals from said courts; which Supreme Court shall retry the cause, as well the issues or questions of fact as of law, and may hear testimony in addition to that given in the court below; and either party shall be allowed one year in which to appeal from the decision of the supreme court of such Territory or the district court in a State to the Supreme Court of the United States, in which court every question shall be open, and whose decision shall be final and conclusive; and should no appeal be taken, the judgment or the decree of the said district court shall in like manner be final and conclusive, as also the decision of the supreme court of the Territory unless appealed from.

SEC. 3. That the testimony which has been heretofore lawfully and regularly received by the surveyor-general of the proper Territory or State, or by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon all claims presented to them respectively, shall be admitted in evidence in all trials under this act when the person testifying is dead, so far as the subject-matter thereof is competent evidence; and the court shall give it such weight as, in its judgment, under all the circumstances, it ought to have.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States, the surveyors-general of such Territories and States, or the keeper of any public records who may have possession of the records and testimony pertaining to any land-grants or claims for land within said States and Territories, in relation to which any petition shall be brought under this act, on the application of any person interested, or by the attorney of the United States for either of said Territories or districts, to furnish copies of such records and testimony, certified under his official signature, with the seal of office thereto annexed, if there be a seal of office; which copies, if the originals are not within the jurisdiction of the court, shall have the same effect as testimony that the originals would have if produced. The legal fees shall be paid for such copies by the parties applying for the same, except the attorney of the United States.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall extend only to such claims as may be presented and filed within three years from the date of its passage; and all petitions under this act may be presented in vacation or term-time, but the final hearing on the same shall be had and the final decree rendered only at the regular terms of the district courts; and the judges of said district courts and the supreme courts in the said Territories are hereby authorized, in vacation, in all cases arising under this act, to grant all orders for taking testimony, or otherwise to hear and dispose of all motions, and do all other things necessary to be done to bring the same on to a final hearing.

SEC. 6. That upon the final decision of any claim prosecuted under this act, in favor of the claimant or claimants, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court in which such final decree is had to transmit a duly certified copy of the decree to the surveyor-general of the proper Territory, who shall thereupon cause the lands specified in said decree to be surveyed at the expense of the United States. Triplicate plats and certificates of the survey so made shall be returned into his office, one of which shall remain in his office, and one, duly authenticated, shall be delivered, on demand, to the party interested therein, and one shall be sent to the Commissioner of the General Land Office; on receipt and approval of which survey and plat by said Commissioner, the President of the United States shall issue a patent to said claimant, subject to the provisions of this act; but one-half the necessary expense of making such survey and plat shall be paid by the claimant, and shall be a lien on said land, which may be enforced by sale of so much thereof as shall be necessary for that purpose, after a default of payment thereof for six months next after the approval of such survey and plat; and no patent shall issue until such payment.

SEC. 7. That the clerk of the court in which such petition may be filed shall, and he is hereby directed, when any petition or claim is filed under the provisions of this act, before any proceedings thereon, subject to the direction of a judge, to require reasonable security for all costs and charges which may accrue thereon in prosecuting the same to a final decree; and the district attorney, clerk, marshal, and witnesses shall severally be allowed such fees for their services and attendance as may be allowed by law for the like services and attendance in the United States courts for the proper State or Territory.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the attorney of the United States for the proper Territory, in every case when the decision or decree of the district court is against the United States, to appeal the cause to the supreme court of the Territory; and if the decision of the latter court be against the United States, a copy of the decree, with a statement of the legal questions involved, shall be transmitted by the district attorney to the Attorney-General; and in like manner he shall transmit a copy of the decree in any case in the district court in a State, and, unless the Attorney-General shall otherwise direct, the district attorney shall appeal the cause to the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 9. That if in any case it shall so happen that the lands decreed to any claimant under the provisions of this act shall have been sold or granted for a valuable consideration by the United States, it shall be lawful for such claimants, or their legal representatives, at any time within one year after the rendition of the final decree in their favor, to execute and file, in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a release to the United States of all right, title, or claim to the land so sold or granted by the United States; and thereupon there shall be issued by the said Commissioner, (under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior,) to such claimant or his legal representatives, scrip for an equal amount of acres so released in quantities not exceeding six hundred and forty acres each, which scrip shall be assignable in such form as may be prescribed by said Secretary, and shall be receivable in payment for any public lands in either of said Territories or States respectively that may be subject to private entry.

SEC. 10. That the provisions of this act shall extend to any city lot, town lot, village lot, farm lot, or pasture lot held under a grant from any corporation or town to which lands may have been lawfully granted for the establishment of a city, town, or village by the Spanish or Mexican government, or the lawful authorities thereof; but the claim for said city, town, or village shall be presented by the corporate authorities of the said city, town, or village, or, where the land upon which said city, town, or village is situated was originally granted to an individual, the claim shall be presented by or in the name of said individual.

SEC. 11. That all claims which are capable of being prosecuted under the provisions of this act shall, after three years from the taking effect of this act, if no petition in respect to the same shall have been filed as hereinbefore provided, be deemed and taken, in all courts and elsewhere, to be abandoned, and shall be forever barred.

SEC. 12. That all the foregoing proceedings and rights shall be conducted and decided, subject to the following provisions, as well as to the other provisions of this act, namely:

First. No claim shall be allowed that shall not appear to be upon a title lawfully and regularly derived from the government of Spain or Mexico, or, if incomplete, one that at the date of the acquisition of the territory by the United States the claimant would have had a lawful right to make perfect, had the territory not been acquired by the United States, and that the United States are bound, upon the principles of public law, or by the provisions of the treaty of cession, to respect and permit to become complete and perfect.

Second. No claim shall be allowed that shall interfere with or overthrow any just and unextinguished Indian title or right to any land or place.

Third. No allowance or confirmation of any claim shall confer any right or title to any gold, silver, or quicksilver mines or minerals, unless the grant claimed under provided for and effected the donation or sale of such mines or minerals to the grantee; but all such mines and minerals shall remain the property of the United States, with the right of working the same, which fact shall be stated in any patents issued under this act.

Fourth. No claim shall be allowed for any land the right to which has hitherto been lawfully acted upon and decided by Congress, or under its authority.

Fifth. No proceeding, decree, or act under this act shall conclude or affect the private rights of persons as between each other; all which rights shall be reserved and saved to the same effect as if this act had not been passed; but the proceedings, decrees, and acts herein provided for shall be conclusive of all rights as between the United States and all persons claiming any interest or right in such lands.

Sixth. No confirmation of or decree concerning any claim under this act shall in any manner operate or have effect against the United States otherwise than as a release by the United States of its right and title to the land confirmed; nor shall it operate to make the United States in any manner liable in respect of any such grants, claims, or lands, or their disposition, otherwise than as herein provided.

Seventh. No confirmation shall in any case be made or patent issued for a greater quantity than eleven square leagues of land, to or in the right of any one original grantee or claimant, nor for a greater quantity than was authorized by the respective laws of Spain or Mexico applicable to the claim.

SEC. 13. That section 8 of the act of Congress approved July 22, A. D. 1854, entitled "An act to establish the offices of surveyor-general of New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes," and all acts amendatory or in extension thereof, or supplementary thereto, and all provisions of law inconsistent with this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. SARGENT. This is a very important bill, and I do not think it ought to pass without at least an explanation. I think there ought to be a very careful examination before we pass this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will make all the explanation I can that any gentleman requires. The bill is designed to settle the land titles derived from the Spanish and Mexican governments only, in the Territories and States of the United States that came to the dominion of the United States from the governments either of Spain or of Mexico. Part of these Territories we obtained from Spain through France, part we obtained from Spain directly; and part we obtained from Spain through Mexico, which is the largest part. This is only a provision such as was made for California, with such changes as experience has proved to be necessary to enable the United States to perform the duty that it undertook to perform by the treaties through which it acquired dominion over this country, and that is, to recognize and protect rights of property derived from the governments from whom we obtained these Territories.

The necessity for such legislation I need hardly speak about. It has been attempted to be obviated in these Territories hitherto for many years by a variety of empirical contrivances—if I may use such a term—of having surveyors-general and recorders of land titles, and all sorts of executive people take evidence and report to the General Land Office, and so on, and allow confirmations or rejections to be made upon that. The evils of that method have been discovered to be enormous. If a claim was rejected under that method of investigation, the claimant was never satisfied, and year after year he or his grantees or assignees or heirs would continually apply to Congress to confirm the grant which the executive officers under the law had already rejected; and like most cases of such application persistence at last would very frequently win, when if the case had been determined upon judicial principles and in a judicial court where there was no outside elbowing and button-holing and pressure and sympathy, there is not one in ten of them probably that have ever been confirmed by Congress which were originally rejected by the executive officers that would have been allowed, or should have been.

Experience also has demonstrated very largely in cases of these confirmations of particular grants by Congress, that Congress very often was led into confirming a grant to a particular ranch or claim by name instead of by metes and bounds. The consequence has been discovered to be in many instances to make grants a hundred times greater than the original grant was intended to be by the Spanish or the Mexican governments; but the act of Congress having used a description that was capable of such elasticity as a description by name is, there was no help for it, and these people got the land. Several cases of that kind have been discovered in the courts through disputes between private persons, where the fraud turned out to be enormous.

Then, on the other hand, in respect of the cases that the surveyors-general and the Commissioners of the General Land Office have confirmed, it has been too frequently discovered that the surveyors-general and the local officials whoever they were who had to do these things in these distant Territories and at the land offices, and so on, would either through prejudice, or ignorance, or bias, or something worse, allow a case on paper to be made up of the validity of a claim which had no real foundation at all, and would send on the certified statements of their findings, &c., to the General Land Office in the Interior Department, where everything would appear to be perfectly fair, and get a patent in that way.

These Territories, particularly Arizona and New Mexico, where the largest part of these unadjusted claims now exist, are rapidly settling up through the introduction of railroads and otherwise, and the necessity for the peace and prosperity of these Territories, and the good order of society, of having the land titles quieted, is of course very great.

The original draught of the bill proposed commissioners in the fashion of the original California proceeding. The committee thought, after a careful investigation, after hearing the views of the Department of the Interior, the views of Senators and Delegates from these Territories, the views of many claimants of claims themselves, who claimed to be owners of these grants, that it was better for all parties concerned, in respect of speed as well as in respect of the due administration of justice between them all, to begin at once in the district courts of the Territories, or where it happens to be in a State, of which there are a very few instances, in the United States district court for the State, for the reason that if you begin with commissioners every case has to be reported to the district court, or may be appealed there, where it is retried as an open case upon the evidence as well as upon the questions of law that arise. The committee all thought that it was much better in respect of economy and diligence as well as safety to have the territorial district courts and the district courts of the United States in the States take original jurisdiction of these matters and proceed upon ample notice to everybody, never ex parte in the sense of taking anything for granted, always upon proof, to determine all these questions.

That explains in a general way the nature and object of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to suggest an amendment to the Senator from Vermont, on page 5, line 55, of the first section, where the substitute reads:

> And in default of such plea, answer, or demurrer being made within said thirty days, or within the further time which may have been granted as aforesaid, the court shall proceed to hear the cause on the petition and proofs, and render a final decree according to the provisions of this act.

I do not think that the district attorney ought to be intrusted with the power of permitting a default to be entered against the Government. I think that the default should be only as to other contestants or claimants, and that the district attorney ought to be made to defend on the part of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We do make it so in another part of the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know; but in the sentence above, in lines 49 and 50, the district attorney and the adverse claimants are required to file their plea or answer demurrer within thirty days; and in default of that then certain proceedings are to be had. That would apparently give the district attorney power to suffer a default.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see the point of my honorable friend's observation; but I think if he will read the whole clause he will see that we have provided against it in every way that it can be provided against with justice to a claimant. Beginning at the foot of page 14 we read,—notice being served upon the district attorney—

It shall be the duty of the United States attorney for the proper district, as also any adverse possessor or claimant, after service of petition and citation, within thirty days or such further time as may be allowed, to enter an appearance, and plead, answer, or demur.

In default of that, that is, if they do not do it, what then? That the petition shall be taken as confessed? By no manner of means. In default of that—

The court shall proceed to hear the cause on the petition and proofs, and render a final decree. * * * and in no case shall a decree be entered otherwise than upon a full legal proof and hearing.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that point, but I refer to the clause "in default of such plea, answer, or demurrer on the part of the district attorney or any adverse possessor or claimant." I think that ought to be limited to the adverse possessor or claimant, and that the district attorney ought not to be placed in such a position that he can permit a default to be taken against the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The consequence of putting it in the way the Senator proposes would be this: if there was ever so just a claim, or no matter whether the claim was just or unjust, if opposing interests desired to have it heard and disposed of, and the district attorney through negligence or corruption or any other cause should be induced not to enter an appearance and file an answer, the case would be hung up and the court could not take another step. The Senator does not mean to do that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Make it his imperative duty to file an answer, and then if he does not do it the court could take action in the matter. I presume if forced to do it, however corrupt he might be, he would not exhibit his corruption by a violation of a plain statute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, here is the plain statute, which says it shall be his duty to file an answer, and that may be essential to justice; and if, in despite of its justice, positively commanded by law, the district attorney for any reason does not file an answer, the provision is that the case shall not thereby be hung up and the original claimant or the original opponent prevented from having a hearing. The substitute provides that then the case shall go on, but it shall not go on upon any defaults, upon any confessions, but only upon full legal proof and hearing. I think the Senator on reflection will see that it would be highly unjust to make even the wrongful misconduct of the district attorney in failing to perform his duty a means of suspending proceedings in the cause to the injury of all the claimants.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri offer an amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. I made a suggestion. I think the bill ought to be amended in that way; but I will not offer any amendment until the other is disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is to strike out, in line 35, section 2, page 16, after the word "and," the words:

And may hear testimony in addition to that given in the court below.

Mr. GARLAND. I offer the amendment more for the purpose of getting some explanation from the Senator from Vermont. Upon principle I am opposed to making the Supreme Court anything but what the Constitution contemplates it to be, that is, a court of review entirely. I think it is not good policy that new matter should be brought before that court and bushels of testimony heard which could as well be heard in the court below.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That subject was considered very carefully by the committee, and it was discussed by people from the Interior Department and by gentlemen having claims there, and we gave a very full hearing to it; and we thought, owing to the very extensive area of many of these claims in New Mexico and Arizona, some of them I believe covering more than a hundred thousand acres of land, that inasmuch as the district court of the Territory has jurisdiction which is composed, as the Senator will remember, of a single judge, a territorial judge, it would not be safe in some of these cases of such very large consequence to the public as well as to the claimants to make the finding of facts and the hearing of witnesses final in a court held by a single judge in some distant part of a Territory, and that in a proper case of appeal to the Supreme Court it should be open to a full rehearing. We all came to that conclusion in the interest of protecting just claimants and protecting the rights of the United States against the enormous influences that in some of these tremendous grants might be brought to bear to get a legal decision of a court composed of one judge.

Mr. GARLAND. It struck me that the jurisdiction already given to the Supreme Court to review both the issues of fact and of law was sufficient. I could not very well think this was an exceptional case where we should provide for the Supreme Court hearing testimony. I am willing, however, to withdraw the amendment on the explanation of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will say in reply to my friend further as to the Supreme Court that, according to the course of practice in that court, unless we expressly require it by law, though every question is open on the record, they would not retry the facts unless we authorized it.

Mr. SARGENT. The general object of this bill has my most hearty concurrence. It is certainly a great necessity of the Territories and State mentioned here that these land titles should be settled, but it is very important that the settlement should be such that only lands which belong to the claimants shall be confirmed to them. In my own State I think, under the system devised before, the result was that a large proportion or a considerable proportion of the grants were fraudulent, and recently a case was before the Supreme Court where a patent has not yet been issued, but there was an attempt to set aside a judgment on the ground that the papers were forged after the admission of the State into the Union, and, consequently, there could not have been any grant from the Mexican government, but the Supreme Court held that the judgment was binding, bound the Government, and, notwithstanding this obvious fraud was proposed to be shown, that it could not be shown and thereby protect the Government and the people of the United States.

In the case of California the system was the appointment of a commission and an appeal from them to the United States district court, and thence to the United States Supreme Court. It seems to me that very little safeguard is left in this bill where the whole jurisdiction of the first United States court or of the commission is given to a district judge who receives but $2,500 a year to pass upon all these important questions. I should like to have the attention of the Senator who reports this bill to the fact that the judge in whose hands this great power is to be placed receives but $2,500 a year for his services. You cannot get the highest order of talent—I say nothing of integrity—for such a price as that in the Territories or in the States, and it seems to me it is too much power to put in the hands of a man whose services, he being a lawyer, can be procured for so small a sum.

In some of the Territories the amount of business created by this bill will be enormous. The dockets will be crowded with these petitions. One feature of this bill should be, I think, that until this class of cases is disposed of or a reasonable time is allowed for their disposition, a higher salary should be paid to these judges, or else the bill ought to create a special tribunal to try these cases. I am not in favor of trying again the experiment of a commission, for I believe the proceedings on the former commission were extremely loose, and almost anything in the nature of a grant went readily and easily through their hands to confirmation, so far as they were concerned. Perhaps a judge, where the proceedings are more formal before him and who is accustomed to give reasons for decisions, would be a better tribunal to try such cases; but certainly not a judge who receives so small pay as we give to our territorial judges.

Another proposition of this bill, it seems to me, is in conflict with the decision of the Supreme Court in the Mariposa case. It is years since I have seen that decision; but I think the court there decided that mineral lands, even if they were claimed as mineral claims as they were in that case as mining claims, go with the grant and should be patented to the claimant provided he is entitled to the land. That is my recollection of the decision in that case; and although I do not now recollect the reasoning of the court, it seems to me that the position they took was that the laws of Mexico under which these grants were made contemplated that mineral lands should pass by the grants.

That decision of the Supreme Court, whether good law or not—and I am bound to presume it was good law—was wholesome, so far as preserving the peace of communities in California was concerned. If the owner of land is not entitled to everything which it contains, but any one else may enter upon it to search for or develop that which it contains, there at once arises a conflict of interest amounting in some cases in my State where it has arisen between agricultural claimants and mining claimants to bloodshed. The peace of communities has been disturbed, and more property destroyed perhaps than the mines were worth in the eagerness of men to acquire, where the right was doubtful and the courts could not step in at once and decide it.

This seems to me to be a license to persons, where minerals may be found, to enter upon land which has been patented to the claimants.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired. Is there objection to the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to object to the consideration of the bill, but I should like time to examine that decision and see whether my recollection of it is correct, and I should like to know, if I am correct in this opinion of the Supreme Court, why this legislation takes away from these claimants, as I think against public policy as well as that decision as to private rights, the rights conferred by the grant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly do not wish to press this bill against any just desire of Senators to examine it. It is only a duty that the Committee on Private Land Claims imposed upon me last spring after months of time spent in the study and consideration of the subject and hearing the views of everybody upon it, and the very views that are now being suggested by my honorable friend from California were elaborately presented to us upon this point of reserving out of these confirmations the right to mine for precious metals.

The ground upon which we did that was that, as we understood the Spanish and the Mexican law respecting land grants, as it existed at the time the United States acquired these Territories, grants of land eo nomine did not carry from the sovereign the right to the precious metals, gold and silver, that lay beneath the soil; I will not say what quicksilver might be considered to be. Therefore the theory of this bill being under the treaties only to perfect and make good to the claimant exactly the title to real estate, and no other, that he had acquired by his grant, there was no justification so far as his rights were concerned in giving him more.

Then, when we came to the other suggestion as to the liability to conflict, &c., it appeared to us that the law was so plain that the fact that a confirmed land grant under this act contained in it a gold mine would not justify all the people of the United States or any one of the people of the United States in going upon that man's land either to work the gold mine or to hunt for it. We could not see any authority of law for saying that because the Government has reserved the dominion over gold that lies beneath my farm, therefore every citizen of that government or any citizen of that government has any more authority to go on my farm to hunt for that gold, or to dig it, than he has to go on it and cut my corn or do anything else because he has not any title to the gold. It is in the United States. It would then resolve itself into the question, the private proprietor being the owner of the soil and the United States having the dominion over the gold that lay beneath it, how are their respective rights to be adjusted? The United States has a right that it cannot exercise without invading the possession of the owner of the soil. I grant for a moment for the purpose of this argument that the United States would have a right by law to appropriate so much of his private property as was necessary for the public use of mining for that gold; but they must do it under the authority of law, and they must grant to him such compensation for this use of his property as under the circumstances is just.

Then as to the policy of the thing, it appeared to us in view of the particular situation of things in these two Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, to which this almost entirely applies, that if we say in advance that every confirmed land grant shall carry with it the mines of precious metals that it may contain, there is then a still stronger temptation on the part of false combinations and false claimants to get up a fabricated set of evidence in order to get possession and property in a gold mine that they think exists or know exists beneath this particular piece of soil, and we did not wish to hold out in respect of these enormous grants that exist in those Territories any such temptation. First, let us ascertain who is the proprietor of the land under the treaties, merely executing the treaties according to their true construction. Having ascertained that, if it turns out that under any of these lands thus found to be private property the United States has any interest in a mine of the precious metals, then there will be time enough for Congress to provide the suitable means of having those mines worked without injury to the proprietor of the soil. That was the view of the committee; we may have been wrong, but it struck us that it was right.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, this bill does not refer to minerals merely under another man's land, but it says that mines are reserved, which means, of course, not only the minerals, but the land containing the minerals, because a mine is made up of the minerals and the land which contains them or the rock in place or otherwise. This bill reserves—

> Any right or title to any gold, silver, or quicksilver mine or minerals.

So that it reserves the mines. Now, the Senator says that because these mines are the property of the United States there is no reason why any individual should have a right to explore them, to enter upon them, or enter upon the land of another, in order to work them. I show that it is not the land of another, but the land of the United States, because that is what is reserved, and the general mining law declares that all the mining lands of the United States are open for exploration and occupation by citizens of the United States. So, construing this bill, if it becomes a law, and the general mining law of the United States, the very condition which was not contemplated by the committee will occur, or which they thought would not occur, must necessarily occur under the law, and the law consequently must be imperfect in this respect.

The Senator says the desire is that there shall be no temptation held out to people to forge papers and forge cases in order to acquire these lands by allowing them to acquire mines. That is entirely unnecessary. The additional temptation afforded by mines would be very slight. Rich agricultural lands are those which are usually sought for in grants like these; and it is a fact that the experience of the United States in every part of it has shown wherever gold or silver or quicksilver mining has been carried on that the profits arising from mining are less than the average profits made by agriculturists, and that is very well understood by land-grabbers. Mines are usually in small parcels, requiring a great deal of labor frequently to develop, extremely fluctuating and uncertain in their profits, very frequently worked at a great loss, ordinarily worked at a loss. There are here and there occasional glittering prizes which stimulate the general body of miners to continue in the business; but as a rule the public get the advantage of their work, and not the individuals. In other words, as I said before, and I say it after some thought and examination of the subject, I believe it is a demonstrable fact that the profit which has been made by miners, notwithstanding the thousands of millions poured into the currency of the world, is less than that which has been made by agriculturists in those States where mining and agriculture have been carried on.

Of course gold or silver has a fixed value. It cannot be sold, no matter what the cost of production, above a certain rate, whereas every other article of production has a value dependent upon the labor of its production, on the expense of producing it; so that if gold in a State costs more to produce it, its citizens, governed only by the price of the article elsewhere, cannot charge an extra price there for it. Gold has an intrinsic value; and if it costs fifty dollars an ounce to extract it and it is only worth sixteen or eighteen or twenty dollars an ounce, it is worth no more and no less than if it cost five or six dollars to extract it.

I do not understand the Senator from Vermont to say in his recollection the decision of the Supreme Court in the Mariposa case was not based upon the idea that the grant from Mexico carried the right to the minerals contained within the land. If that is the unreversed opinion of the Supreme Court, then this bill is a nullity. I understand the Senator to say that the committee thought, differing perhaps from the Supreme Court, that the colonization laws of Mexico did not confer upon grantees the right to these mines. If the Supreme Court has said that those laws did confer these rights, this bill is contrary to the decision of the Supreme Court and must be nugatory when brought to the test of the Supreme Court, because they must hold that the United States has not a right to deprive without compensation persons of their individual property. It is not proposed by the bill to take this for public uses in the ordinary sense of the term, or make any compensation for it at all. It simply proposes that this shall be the property of the United States and shall not go to the parties who own the grants. If that is in opposition to the doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court, of course it will only stand until such time as the Supreme Court can pass upon the different titles.

It seems to me worth while to examine that question. For one I do not feel prepared to vote on the bill now. But even if the Supreme Court shall have put it upon some ground of expediency, not upon the right of the parties, and are not clear upon that proposition, still I hold that for the sake of the peace of these Territories it is better to settle this question now, and to let the person who takes the patent to the land take whatever the land contains. I believe so from what I have observed in my own State and what I have read as occurring in the neighboring State of Nevada and other States, and it is better not to have this fire-brand—for that is what it will amount to—thrown into the Territories and into the State of Nevada. The benefit the Government of the United States will derive from the possible sale of this land hereafter will be nothing in comparison with the mischief that would be done by setting the people of the Territories by the ears together, leading them into controversies and lengthy struggles such as have occurred heretofore over questions of this kind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not be able ever to agree, going upon the theory that these Mexican and Spanish grants do not carry the gold and silver mines, that we should confirm these grants without any limitations as to the quantity and a very small quantity. There is in this bill a limitation of eleven square leagues.

Mr. SARGENT. I think that is right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That makes a very large area of land,—eleven square leagues.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not object to that at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The duty under the treaty is to give to every man his own; and we finding under the Spanish and Mexican laws that there was no clear reason for supposing that any grants to which their attention had been drawn, that had been finally perfected (and it is certainly so as to those that had not been finally perfected) were ever given for more than eleven square leagues, and the most of them for much less, therefore we say in no case will we make a confirmation for more than eleven leagues and in every other case within that for no more than what is called for.

That being the state of the case, I submit to my honorable friend that if we are to add anything in the way of mining rights to the title that a man claims, and to which he has no claim except that we give it to him, then I would not give any one man or any set of men, any chance to get any mining rights in any eleven square leagues of land or in any three square leagues of land. That leads to great combinations and mischiefs, and affects society in a thousand ways that I cannot spend your time to enumerate.

But the fundamental idea of the bill, as I stated before, is that we are to give to every man what belongs to him and to give him nothing more. That is the object of this bill. If he wishes for anything more let him, like any other citizen of the United States who wishes to engage in mining or whatever it may be, proceed under the general laws of the United States or under special grants if he can get them in his own case, whatever they may be.

Now in reference to my friend's opinion of the decision of the Supreme Court, I will state frankly that at this moment I have forgotten precisely what the Supreme Court decided in the Mariposa case, although that was before us at the time we framed this clause; but my friend has not noticed apparently the exact nature of this limitation clause which will stand in harmony with every case in which the true construction of the grant does carry a mine. Hear it:

> No allowance or confirmation of any claim shall confer any right or title to any gold, silver, or quicksilver mines or minerals, unless the grant claimed under provided for and effected the donation or sale of such mines or minerals to the grantee.

We say, therefore, that wherever the grant was of a nature that either by express provision or by some implication of law the grantee did get the right to what was by the general principles of the Spanish and Mexican law a royal reservation, there we give him that right, because by the treaty we have engaged to give it to him; but where the effect of his grant is not to give him a right to the mine we say that this bill shall not give it.

Mr. SARGENT. After the word "minerals," on line 18 of section 12, I move to insert "known to exist at the time of filing the petition."

I certainly concede the ability of the argument made by the Senator from Vermont, and I am not entirely sure but that where no mines existed at the time stated, it might not be well as a matter of public policy to exclude them from the confirmation; but I should like to guard against this class of cases: where a person has a grant in good faith from the government of Mexico, and presents that grant, and it passes safely through the various tribunals of the United States to the Supreme Court, and is honest and fair, and is confirmed; he sells that grant out to a great many individuals; towns may spring up on it; in these growing Territories all this is within the range of possibility. Now, if there is a primary right held in the Government that in case minerals, rich or otherwise, thickly settled or thinly scattered, shall be found thereon, then the title to all this property shall become uncertain, it shall be in the Government, and somebody has got to extinguish that, I can see a condition of things extremely undesirable. If it is known at the time of the petition that there are mines, or I might even say at the time of confirmation that there are mines, upon this land, or that it is mineral land, exclude the minerals; but if such a fact is not known, and it is honestly taken as agricultural land, then let the person have it, and if mines are subsequently discovered thereupon, let him work them or let him sell them, dispose of them as he sees fit.

I am not proposing any strange principle here. I suppose that the Committee on Private Land Claims have not had their attention called to the mineral laws of the United States so much as some other Senators who from their locality are compelled to understand these things and follow the legislation, and therefore it is not strange that in legislating upon a question of this kind, which is a little mixed in its character, they do not see its bearings always. It is different with those of us who are compelled to look at them from the experience which we have in our own neighborhoods and from the participation which we had in drawing the original bills and being upon the committees which reported them, or debating them in the Senate, and the arguments which would be forcible to our minds at that time and to other Senators perhaps might not be listened to by the mass as not interesting or might be soon forgotten. Now, we have exactly the principle which I propose here, incorporated in the general mineral law in the case of placer claims, which Senators understand are where the mineral is distributed more or less thinly through a body of agricultural land or not in rock in place. I refer to page 428 of the Revised Statutes, section 2333.

If at the time of the application for the purchase of a placer claim a known vein of quartz containing mineral is in the area desired to be bought, then it must be segregated and bought separately and paid for separately and at a higher price; but if the claim is sold and it is not known that there is any such vein, its subsequent discovery does not divest the possession of the purchaser or his ownership; and the object of that is, as I say, to prevent these disputes, one man entering upon the land of another under that eager thirst for gold which men have which leads them to pry into the land of others, no matter how much disturbance it may be to them, the glittering prize being sufficient to justify in their own eyes any action of that kind, especially if it is sanctioned apparently by the laws of the United States.

I ask the Clerk to read the whole section, as I am a little feeble.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2333. Where the same person, association, or corporation is in possession of a placer claim, and also a vein or lode included within the boundaries thereof application shall be made for a patent for the placer claim, with the statement that it includes such vein or lode, and in such case a patent shall issue for the placer claim, subject to the provisions of this chapter, including such vein or lode, upon the payment of $5 per acre for such vein or lode claim, and twenty-five feet of surface on each side thereof. The remainder of the placer claim, or any placer claim not embracing any vein or lode claim, shall be paid for at the rate of $2.50 per acre, together with all costs of proceedings; and where a vein or lode, such as is described in section 2320, is known to exist within the boundaries of a placer claim, an application for a patent for such placer claim which does not include an application for the vein or lode claim shall be construed as a conclusive declaration that the claimant of the placer claim has no right of possession of the vein or lode claim; but where the existence of a vein or lode in a placer claim is not known, a patent for the placer claim shall convey all valuable mineral and other deposits within the boundaries thereof.

Mr. SARGENT. The party there, if at the time he applies he is not aware of the existence of such vein has the lands: the patent conveys them; and by this means, of course, the Government throws away apparently or sells for what it considers an inadequate price a valuable mine. That mine may subsequently be worth millions of dollars.

THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of half past one o'clock having arrived, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of its unfinished business, being the resolutions introduced by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] upon which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, when I last had the floor I was about to bring to the attention of the Senate the case of the United States vs. Cruikshank, in 2 Otto, upon which the substitute that I have had the honor to offer to the Senate is based chiefly; but before reading the body of the opinion I desire to call attention to a point in it that decides the question left open in the case of Reese vs. The United States, from which I read extensive extracts on the day before yesterday. The point left open in the case of Reese vs. The United States was whether or not the Congress of the United States had the power under the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution to provide for the punishment of those voting at State elections who denied to a person the right to vote in consequence of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The authority to which I now call the attention of the Senate settles that point, and seems to reduce every question that could possibly arise in debate in reference to this whole matter down to those propositions which are stated in the substitute now before the Senate for its consideration. On page 556 of 2 Otto, United States vs. Cruikshank, the seventh and fifteenth counts of the indictment are considered together by the court. The court say:

> The seventh and fifteenth counts are no better than the sixth and fourteenth. The intent here charged is to put the parties named in great fear of bodily harm, and to injure and oppress them, because, being and having been in all things qualified, they had voted "at an election before that time, had and held according to law by the people of the said State of Louisiana, in said State, to wit: on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1872, and at divers other elections by the people of the State, also before that time had and held according to law. There is nothing to show that the elections voted at were any other than State elections or that the conspiracy was formed on account of the race of the parties against whom the conspirators were to act. The charge as made is really of nothing more than a conspiracy to commit a breach of the peace within a State. Certainly it will not be claimed that the United States have the power or are required to do mere police duty in the States. If a State cannot protect itself against domestic violence, the United States may, upon the call of the executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, lend their assistance for that purpose. This is a guarantee of the Constitution, (article 4, section 4,) but it applies to no case like this.

That ruling upon the question presented in the seventh and fifteenth counts of this indictment seems to settle absolutely the proposition that the Congress of the United States have no right to enact laws under the clause authorizing them to enact laws appropriate to carry into effect the fifteenth amendment, to prescribe penalties against persons who in a State election deny to a colored person the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, placing the decision upon the ground that in State elections the regulation of this right by State laws and its enforcement also by State officials is a mere police regulation of the State, which it is not within the jurisdiction or province of Congress to regulate.

I will read further from this decision that portion of it which I understand bears directly upon and sustains to the fullest extent the substitute which I propose to discuss very briefly before the Senate. And in order to get the bearing of this decision properly before the Senate, I will read from the statement of the case as made by the reporter the questions that were in controversy in that case:

> The first count was for banding together, with intent "unlawfully and feloniously to injure, oppress, threaten, and intimidate" two citizens of the United States, "of African descent and persons of color," with the unlawful and felonious intent thereby" them "to hinder and prevent in their respective free exercise and enjoyment of their lawful right and privilege to peaceably assemble together with each other and with other citizens of the said United States for a peaceable and lawful purpose."
> The second avers an intent to hinder and prevent the exercise by the same persons of the "right to keep and bear arms for a lawful purpose."
>
> The third avers an intent to deprive the same persons "of their respective several lives and liberty of person, without due process of law."
>
> The fourth avers an intent to deprive the same persons of the "free exercise and enjoyment of the right and privilege to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property" enjoyed by white citizens.
>
> The fifth avers an intent to hinder and prevent the same persons "in the exercise and enjoyment of the rights, privileges, immunities, and protection granted and secured to them respectively as citizens of the said United States, and as citizens of the said State of Louisiana, by reason of and for and on account of the race and color" of the said persons.
>
> The sixth avers an intent to hinder and prevent the same persons in "the free exercise and enjoyment of the several and respective right and privilege to vote at any election to be thereafter by law had and held by the people in and of the said State of Louisiana."
>
> The seventh avers an intent "to put in great fear of bodily harm, injure, and oppress" the same persons, "because and for the reason" that, having the right to vote, they had voted.
>
> The eighth avers an intent "to prevent and hinder" the same persons "in their several and respective free exercise and enjoyment of every, each, all, and singular the several rights and privileges granted and secured" to them "by the Constitution and laws of the United States."
> The next eight counts are a repetition of the first eight, except that, instead of the words "band together," the words "combine, conspire, and confederate together" are used. Three of the defendants were found guilty under the first sixteen counts, and not guilty under the remaining counts.

The parties convicted moved in arrest of judgment. This was a case that at the time excited much public attention. It was the notorious Grant Parish case, which at the time was a very exciting cause of disturbance throughout the country, particularly in political circles. Three of the accused persons were convicted; and as I have stated moved in arrest of judgment. On this motion the judges in the circuit court were divided in opinion, and the presiding judge held "that the several counts in question are not sufficient in law, and do not contain charges of criminal matter indictable under the laws of the United States, and that the motion in arrest of judgment should be granted;" and that brought the case into the Supreme Court of the United States for its consideration. The acts of Congress on which the indictment was based were laws of like general character with the general legislation upon this subject by Congress to which the Senator from Vermont alludes in his resolutions. The Supreme Court here passes upon these laws, examining the foundations of constitutional law upon which they rest; examining the condition of the persons to whom they are supposed to be applicable, examining the power of Congress in the infliction of punishment for the offenses here charged, examining indeed every view and phase of the case which it seems to me could possibly have arisen under what is called the enforcement law; and, notwithstanding the conviction of these persons was at the time in conformity to a general public sentiment, especially in the majority section, as it was then, of the United States, the Supreme Court felt bound to reverse and annul this decision and to discharge the prisoners. I venture to say that the genius of the Senate of the United States, if it were concentrated upon the proposition of devising a law for the purpose of carrying into effect the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to-day, and if it were undertaking to meet and overcome great resistance and great obstruction to the execution of those provisions of the Constitution, would not be able to devise a more ingenious, a broader, a more complete, a more far-reaching and deep-searching system than that which was contained in the civil-rights bill to which the case of Reese refers, and in the enforcement act to which this case refers.

It is intimated in the resolutions that there is some ground of legislation which has not hitherto been occupied on this subject, but it is intimated only in very general terms; and, as I have observed before, the able Senator from Vermont, who has been chairman of the Judiciary Committee for a long time, has never ventured to bring before the Senate or Congress of the United States a measure which indicates how much further Congress could go in an effort to enforce these amendments than it has gone under the enforcement law and civil-rights laws.

The decision in Cruikshank's case, it seems to me, covers every principle that can hereafter be appealed to or invoked for the purpose of legislation in the further effort to carry the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments into legal effect among the people of the United States. Chief-Justice Waite delivered the opinion in this case also. The court say:

> This case comes here with a certificate by the judges of the circuit court for the district of Louisiana that they were divided in opinion upon a question which occurred at the hearing. It presents for our consideration an indictment containing sixteen counts, divided into two series of eight counts each, based upon section 6 of the enforcement act of May 31, 1870. That section is as follows:
> "That if two or more persons shall band or conspire together, or go in disguise upon the public highway, or upon the premises of another, with intent to violate any provision of this act, or to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having exercised the same, such persons shall be held guilty of felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined or imprisoned, or both, at the discretion of the court—the fine not to exceed $5,000, and the imprisonment not to exceed ten years—and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to, and disabled from holding, any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States."—16 Statutes, 141.

I can hardly conceive of any other words that could be put into that enactment to make it broader in its scope than it is. The court proceed:

> The question certified arose upon a motion in arrest of judgment after a verdict of guilty generally upon the whole sixteen counts, and is stated to be whether "the said sixteen counts of said indictment are severally good and sufficient in law, and contain charges of criminal matter indictable under the laws of the United States."
>
> The general charge in the first eight counts is that of "banding," and in the second eight that of "conspiring" together to injure, oppress, threaten, and intimidate Levi Nelson and Alexander Tillman, citizens of the United States of African descent and persons of color, with the intent thereby to hinder and prevent them in their free exercise and enjoyment of rights and privileges "granted and secured" to them "in common with all other good citizens of the United States by the Constitution and laws of the United States."
> The offenses provided for by the statute in question do not consist in the mere "banding" or "conspiring" of two or more persons together, but in their banding or conspiring with the intent or for any of the purposes specified. To bring this case under the operation of the statute, therefore, it must appear that the right, the enjoyment of which the conspirators intended to hinder or prevent, was one granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. If it does not so appear the criminal matter charged has not been made indictable by any act of Congress.
> We have in our political system a Government of the United States and a government of each of the several States. Each one of these governments is distinct from the others, and each has citizens of its own who owe it allegiance, and whose rights, within its jurisdiction, it must protect. The same person may be at the same time a citizen of the United States and a citizen of a State, but his rights of citizenship under one of these governments will be different from those he has under the other.—Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall., 74.
> Citizens are the members of the political community to which they belong. They are the people who compose the community, and who, in their associated capacity, have established or submitted themselves to the dominion of a government for the promotion of their general welfare and the protection of their individual as well as their collective rights. In the formation of a government the people may confer upon it such powers as they choose. The government when so formed may, and when called upon should, exercise all the powers it has for the protection of the rights of its citizens and the people within its jurisdiction, but it can exercise no other. The duty of a government to afford protection is limited always by the power it possesses for that purpose.

Therefore when the Senator from Vermont avers, as he does in his resolutions, that the people of all the States have a common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State of the Union, that statement, when it comes to assume a legal form and is put into shape under the restrictions which judicial authority imposes upon it, must be qualified to this extent, that the duty of a Government to afford protection is limited always by the power it possesses for that purpose. If the Government possesses no power for the purpose of affording protection to the people of a State, if in the Constitution there is no such actual grant of power to the Government of the United States or to Congress, then Congress has no such power, and it cannot be asserted as matter of law, and especially as matter of constitutional law, that the interest which the people of the several States are supposed to have in the enforcement of the Constitution in every other State of the Union is that sort of legal, tangible, direct, and valuable interest which entitles them to go into a State through the assistance of the common agency, Congress, and demand its execution or its enforcement. The court proceed:

> Experience made the fact known to the people of the United States that they required a national government for national purposes. The separate governments of the separate States, bound together by the articles of confederation alone, were not sufficient for the promotion of the general welfare of the people in respect to foreign nations, or for their complete protection as citizens of the confederated States. For this reason the people of the United States, "in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty" to themselves and their posterity, (Const. preamble,) ordained and established the Government of the United States, and defined its powers by a Constitution, which they adopted as its fundamental law and made its rule of action.
> The Government thus established and defined is to some extent a government of the States in their political capacity. It is, also, for certain purposes, a government of the people. Its powers are limited in number, but not in degree. Within the scope of its powers, as enumerated and defined, it is supreme and above the States, but beyond it has no existence. It was erected for special purposes and endowed with all the powers necessary for its own preservation and the accomplishment of the ends its people had in view. It can neither grant nor secure to its citizens any right or privilege not expressly, or by implication, placed under its jurisdiction.
> The people of the United States resident within any State are subject to two governments, one State and the other national, but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes and have separate jurisdictions. Together they make one whole and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad. True, it may sometimes happen that a person is amenable to both jurisdictions for one and the same act. Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a State, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance, and that of the State by the breach of peace in the assault. So, too, if one passes the counterfeited coin of the United States within a State it may be an offense against the United States and the State; the United States, because it discredits the coin, and the State, because of the fraud upon him to whom it is passed. This does not, however, necessarily imply that the two governments possess powers in common or bring them into conflict with each other. It is the natural consequence of a citizenship which owes allegiance to two sovereignties and claims protection from both. The citizen cannot complain, because he has voluntarily submitted himself to such a form of government. He owes allegiance to the two departments, so to speak, and within their respective spheres must pay the penalties which each exacts for disobedience to its laws. In return he can demand protection from each within its own jurisdiction.
> The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States or the people. No rights can be acquired under the Constitution or laws of the United States except such as the Government of the United States has the authority to grant or secure. All that cannot be so granted or secured are left under the protection of the States.

This definition is by no means new; it is contemporaneous with the organization of this form of our Government. When we passed from the government of confederated States into the Union, these doctrines were then in full force and effect and had a bearing upon every mind in the country. They were discussed by the greatest men of that age, and I think we may justly say in favor of our own history that no greater men ever lived. It was then settled. The final security of this doctrine was afterward, in consequence of some doubts about the interpretation of the Constitution, placed in the form of amendments to that instrument, and from that day to this the doctrine which the Supreme Court has here so plainly stated has been the recognized doctrine at least of the democrats in the United States. The democratic party would have no basis or foundation upon which it could rest if that doctrine were stricken out of the Constitution. It is the respect of the law-making power of this country for these definitions of the power of Congress and these definitions of the prohibitions upon the States and these definitions of the reserved rights of the States and of the people, upon which rests to-day the security of liberty in this country as it is understood at least by the democratic party.

Earlier in my argument I made some reference to the amendments of the Constitution of the United States in connection with the question of the power of Congress to enforce those amendments by penal statutes against the people of the States. In the further reading of this opinion it will be seen that these different amendments are discussed, and the powers of Congress are measured by these amendments. There are many rights secured in the first twelve amendments of the Constitution of the United States, or in most of them, which are entirely personal to the individual citizen, whether of a State or of the United States. These rights at the time this Government was ordained, and at this time, too, are supposed after all to be the most vital rights which belong to Americans; for, Mr. President, it is of but little worth to a man that he may claim the honors, privileges, and immunities of an American citizen if in virtue of that citizenship he cannot claim freedom from arrest without due cause supported by oath or affirmation; if he cannot have the benefit of the right of trial by jury; if he cannot be tried according to due process of law; if cruel or unusual punishments may be inflicted upon him; if soldiers may be quartered in his house in time of peace, or if his property may be taken without just compensation. These things and many others which are mentioned in these amendments of the Constitution as belonging as matter of individual right to the man as a citizen of the country are to him, to the voter of this country, not only the most sacred, but at the same time the most valuable of all the rights that he possesses.

When these constitutional amendments were put into the Constitution for the better security of these rights, and when the declaration of the bill of rights in the original Constitution was also made for the purpose of withholding the hand of power from an illegal assault upon or interruption of these rights, it was supposed that one of the greatest duties that this people owed to themselves had been performed in the ordaining of the Constitution of the United States. And when a common agent was created between these different States and the people thereof, and when the "common interests" to which the Senator from Vermont refers in his resolutions which all the people had in the maintenance and enforcement of the Constitution in favor of citizens everywhere was considered, the question almost immediately arose for judicial decision, has not this common agent, this Congress of the United States, that stands between all these people, the right, the power, the jurisdiction, the authority, so to enact, so to provide, so to appropriate money, so to supply all efficient agencies that the Government may need as to carry into effect every right of every citizen of the United States mentioned in these various amendments. But by decision after decision, commencing I believe within less than five years after the Constitution was first adopted and coming on down to this day, the Supreme Court of the United States has declared that Congress was never created as a common agent for the purpose of the preservation of these sacred rights of individuals under this instrument. Often and over men have come to the Supreme Court of the United States appealing to it against the laws and the constitutions of States for protection against their own local governments, on the idea that the Congress of the United States, being the power to enforce all the guarantees, privileges, and immunities of the Constitution of the United States, was the rightful authority to protect these citizens. But that court has felt itself compelled always to decide that Congress had no such power. Why has not Congress such power? Because Congress was not created for that purpose; these are not national purposes; they are local and individual purposes. They have no necessary connection with the administration of the Government of the United States. Their connection is solely and only with the local institutions under which these people happen to live.

Congress has also often disclaimed such power, until a recent date when it has undertaken to apply another rule, and the Supreme Court have set themselves steadfastly against the new aggression and have decided that the Congress of the United States was no place in which to make laws for the government of men in their capacity merely of citizens of the different States. I do not want to legislate for the government of the constituency of the Senator from Vermont; I do not wish to take upon my hands the charge of the affairs of the people in Oregon or in Florida. I was not sent here for the purpose of undertaking to rectify and correct within those States whatever might strike my mind as being an invasion by those States or by their officers of the Constitution of the United States. The functions which I have the right to discharge here, the duties in which I have a right to participate here, are those that are conferred upon Congress by the Constitution of the United States, and those only; and when I leave this field of jurisdiction and authority and undertake to pass beyond its boundary and interfere with affairs in the local governments of the various States, according to the decision in this case and according to the decision in every other case that has been made in the Supreme Court of the United States, I have violated my duty as a legislator.

The different counts in the indictment are considered by the court in Cruikshank's case with reference to several different amendments of the Constitution of the United States. I will proceed to read further:

> The first and ninth counts state the intent of the defendants to have been to hinder and prevent the citizens named in the free exercise and enjoyment of their "lawful right and privilege to peaceably assemble together with each other and with other citizens of the United States for a peaceful and lawful purpose."

Suppose that the Legislature of Vermont—a thing I know that it will never do—should undertake to pass a law by which the right of the citizens of that State peaceably to assemble together with each other or with other citizens of the United States should be prohibited, there would be flagrant, open violation of the Constitution of the United States. Does it not look reasonable that Congress should have the power to repeal that law, or that Congress should have the power to punish those who might undertake to enforce it? Does it not look just as reasonable that Congress should have the power to enforce a right of the citizens of that State as it does that Congress should have the right to interfere with some man who would go to a crowded, peaceable assembly, and break it up because they were conversing about elections, or prevent persons from peaceably assembling because they intended to discuss an election that was pending? Now let us see what the Supreme Court says about this matter, because here is a crucial test in regard to these powers. It says:

> The right of the people peaceably to assemble for lawful purposes existed long before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. In fact it is, and always has been, one of the attributes of citizenship under a free government. It "derives its source," to use the language of Chief-Justice Marshall, in Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 211, "from those laws whose authority is acknowledged by civilized man throughout the world." It is found wherever civilization exists. It was not, therefore, a right granted to the people by the Constitution. The Government of the United States when established found it in existence, with the obligation on the part of the States to afford it protection. As no direct power over it was granted to Congress, it remains, according to the ruling in Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 203, subject to State jurisdiction. Only such existing rights were committed by the people to the protection of Congress as came within the general scope of the authority granted to the National Government.
> The first amendment of the Constitution prohibits Congress from abridging "the right of the people to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." This, like the other amendments proposed and adopted at the same time, was not intended to limit the powers of the State governments in respect to their own citizens, but to operate upon the National Government alone. (Barron vs. The City of Baltimore, 7 Pet., 250; Lessee of Livingston vs. Moore, 7 Pet., 551; Fox vs. Ohio, 5 How., 434; Smith vs. Maryland, 18 How., 76; Withers vs. Buckley, 20 How., 90; Pervear vs. The Commonwealth, 5 Wall., 479; Twitchell vs. The Commonwealth, 7 Wall., 321; Edwards vs. Elliott, 21 Wall., 557.) It is now too late to question the correctness of this construction. As was said by the late chief justice, in Twitchell vs. The Commonwealth, 7 Wall., 325, "the scope and application of these amendments are no longer subjects of discussion here." They left the authority of the States just where they found it, and added nothing to the already existing powers of the United States.
> The particular amendment now under consideration assumes the existence of the right of the people to assemble for lawful purposes, and protects it against encroachment by Congress. The right was not created by the amendment; neither was its continuance guaranteed, except as against congressional interference. For their protection in its enjoyment, therefore, the people must look to the States. The power for that purpose was originally placed there, and it has never been surrendered to the United States.

When did the right to vote in the United States have its origin? How long has that privilege of free government been exercised on this continent? When was it that privilege was not exercised since civilization first got a foothold here? It is one of the ancient and established rights of citizenship, first of the colonies and afterward of the confederated States, and afterward of the States of the Union. The Government found it here, adopted it, could not discard it. The people of the United States would never have formed governments, local or national, upon the exclusion of their right to vote and participate in the management of their public affairs. So this ancient and thoroughly established right was a part of the common law of America, part of what jurists and publicists call "the law of the land," when this Government was ordained. It was as much so as the right to life, liberty, and property, the right of free speech, and more so than the right of free religion. This right to vote was recognized and enforced everywhere within the borders that were afterward included within the jurisdiction of the United States under the Constitution. No more is this old right to vote subject to the power of Congress to control, prevent, prohibit, or qualify it by conditions, than was the right of peaceable assemblage of citizens to discuss questions that might be political, religious, or polemical.

The second and tenth counts of this indictment and the law upon which the second and tenth counts were framed had reference to the execution of the second amendment to the Constitution. The court say:

> The second and tenth counts are equally defective. The right there specified is that of "bearing arms for a lawful purpose." This is not a right granted by the Constitution. Neither is it in any manner dependent upon that instrument for its existence. The second amendment declares that it shall not be infringed; but this, as has been seen, means no more than that it shall not be infringed by Congress. This is one of the amendments that has no other effect than to restrict the powers of the National Government, leaving the people to look for their protection against any violation by their fellow-citizens of the rights it recognizes, to what is called in The City of New York vs. Miln, 11 Pet., 139, the "powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or what was, perhaps, more properly called internal police," "not surrendered or restrained" by the Constitution of the United States.

Now is not the right to bear arms in this country a right that no State can violate? Can any State pass a law saying that "no citizen of this State shall hereafter have the right to bear arms?" Certainly not; but a State can say you shall not carry them concealed beneath your clothing; you shall not carry them concealed unless you are traveling upon the public highways or upon a journey; you shall not carry them to a place where large assemblages of citizens meet; you shall not carry them into or about a drinking saloon; you shall not carry them under such circumstances that they may become dangerous to society. The right, however, the State cannot deny except by imposing legal qualifications, by limitations upon the exercise of the right. This right Congress cannot abridge at all, because it was one of the original rights existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution which rested upon the right of citizenship of the people of the different States, and had its origin long before the Constitution of the United States came into existence.

The third and eleventh counts are based on that part of this statute which had its foundation in the fifth amendment of the Constitution:

> The third and eleventh counts are even more objectionable. They charge the intent to have been to deprive the citizens named, they being in Louisiana, "of their respective several lives and liberty of person without due process of law."

It would seem that if the Congress of the United States had any jurisdiction over an individual citizen of that State at all, it might be and it ought to be a jurisdiction for the protection of his life and his liberty, for it is for the purpose of protecting life and liberty that this Constitution was ordained, more, perhaps, than for all other purposes.

> This is nothing else—

Say the Supreme Court—

> than alleging a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder citizens of the United States, being within the territorial jurisdiction of the State of Louisiana. The rights of life and personal liberty are natural rights of man.

Just as we might say about the right to vote being a natural right of the citizen of a free government, and especially of a free constitutional republican government.

"To secure these rights"—

That is, the right to life and liberty—

says the Declaration of Independence, "governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." The very highest duty of the States, when they entered into the Union under the Constitution, was to protect all persons within their boundaries in the enjoyment of these "inalienable rights with which they are endowed by their Creator." Sovereignty, for this purpose, rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

Now we come to the fourteenth amendment, which was the first step, chronologically considered, of the new institution in our organic law of certain rights, powers, privileges, immunities in favor of citizens, and certain restrictions upon the power of States as they then existed, which grew out of the late civil war. At the time of the adoption of the fourteenth amendment the necessities of the republican party had not got to be so great as they were when the fifteenth amendment was offered. It was supposed that the influence of the fourteenth amendment upon the legislation of the States and upon the conduct of the General Government would be altogether sufficient to perpetuate the power of the republican party, which seemed, from the time it laid its hands upon the scepter of power in the Southern States, thereafter to forget every other purpose of its mission than the mere perpetuation of its authority over the people. It may have been a blessing to the land or it may not have been; but whether a blessing or a curse there was one supreme idea connected with it in the minds of those who took charge of it, and that was esto perpetua. "There shall be no end to republican rule" was the idea that was embraced in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and was afterward intensified and intended to be made irrevocable by the fifteenth amendment; and by keeping our eyes somewhat upon the movement of this great party which ordained this constitutional amendment and forced it upon the States we shall begin to appreciate something of the progress and the grounds of progress and the extent to which the progress has gone in restrictions upon the power of the States, and also in conferring new powers upon the Congress of the United States under these two amendments. Say the court:

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, but this adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guarantee against any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society. As was said by Mr. Justice Johnson, in Bank of Columbia vs. Okely, 4 Wheat., 244, it secures "the individual from the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private rights and distributive justice." These counts in the indictment do not call for the exercise of any of the powers conferred by this provision in the amendment.

The fourth and twelfth counts charge the intent to have been to prevent and hinder the citizens named, who were of African descent and persons of color, in "the free exercise and enjoyment of their several right and privilege to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings, then and there, before that time enacted or ordained by the said State of Louisiana and by the United States; and then and there, at that time, being in force in the said State and district of Louisiana aforesaid for the security of their respective persons and property, then and there, at that time enjoyed at and within said State and district of Louisiana by white persons, being citizens of said State of Louisiana and the United States, for the protection of the persons and property of said white citizens." There is no allegation that this was done because of the race or color of the persons conspired against. When stripped of its verbiage the case as presented amounts to nothing more than that the defendants conspired to prevent certain citizens of the United States, being within the State of Louisiana, from enjoying the equal protection of the laws of the State and of the United States.

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which precedes it, and which we have just considered, add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guarantee.

It is no part of the duty of Congress to say that any individual citizen, though he may be a citizen of the United States claiming the protection of this provision of the Constitution of the United States, is protected against any other citizen not acting under the authority of the laws of a State when that other citizen undertakes to deprive him of his rights under that fourteenth amendment.

No question arises under the civil rights act of April 9, 1866, (14 Stat., 27,) which is intended for the protection of citizens of the United States in the enjoyment of certain rights, without discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, because, as has already been stated, it is nowhere alleged in these counts that the wrong contemplated against the rights of these citizens was on account of their race or color.

Another objection is made to these counts that they are too vague and uncertain. This will be considered hereafter in connection with the same objection to other counts.

The sixth and fourteenth counts state the intent of the defendants to have been to hinder and prevent the citizens named, being of African descent and colored, "in the free exercise and enjoyment of their several and respective right and privilege to vote at any election to be thereafter by law had and held by the people in and of the said State of Louisiana, or by the people of and in the parish of Grant aforesaid." In Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wall., 178, we decided that the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States. In United States vs. Reese et al., supra, p. 214, we hold that the fifteenth amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is, exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. From this it appears that the right of suffrage is not a necessary attribute of national citizenship, but that exemption from discrimination in the exercise of that right on account of race, &c., is. The right to vote in the States comes from the States, but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. The first has not been granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States, but the last has been.

Inasmuch, therefore, as it does not appear in these counts that the intent of the defendants was to prevent these parties from exercising their right to vote on account of their race, &c., it does not appear that it was their intent to interfere with any right granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. We may suspect that race was the cause of the hostility, but it is not so averred. This is material to a description of the substance of the offense, and cannot be supplied by implication. Everything essential must be charged positively, and not inferentially. The defect here is not in form but in substance.

That case of Happersett vs. Minor in 21 Wallace very powerfully sustains the view that I take, and it was afterward affirmed in the decision in the case of Cruikshank.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. President, that these declarations of law by the Supreme Court of the United States remove almost every possible cloud that the imagination of man could bring upon this subject. It looks to me as if there was left almost no possible field of disputation or debate about it. But the Senator from Vermont has seen for a long time, I suppose—I really do not know whether it is a sudden revelation or whether it is the result of a long process of mental examination and incubation—but he seems to have seen that which he has withholden from us, that which he has not done us the honor even to intimate to us, that there is still some legislative action which may be taken and ought to be taken by the Congress of the United States for the further and better protection of the rights of persons under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, and even under the thirteenth, for he puts them all in. It has been my inability to conjecture what the precise characteristics of these laws may be upon which the mind of the Senator from Vermont has been so long cogitating that has made it necessary for me to examine in this opening, which I have been compelled to make upon his own resolutions, all possible and all imaginable grounds on which it might be supposed there could arise any necessity for legislation upon this subject which I hoped had gone to the tomb of the Capulets.

I will content myself with these references to law. I have desired to bring these opinions distinctly before the Senate of the United States for the purpose of arousing the attention of Senators on either side of this Chamber to the inquiry whether or not there is some need of further legislation, or whether there is any possible ground of further legislation that has not been already occupied by existing statutes in reference to the enforcement of the rights of the colored people under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. I have therefore been compelled to assume in the argument which I have made here that it was the intention of the Senator from Vermont by some sweeping act of congressional legislation to wipe out every supposed obstruction that might exist in State laws and State constitutions to the full and complete enforcement of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. I have not any doubt that if he can get the consent of the Senate he will go further than that and commence legislating directly for the States in these particulars, and against individuals of the States, and that men will be hauled into the Federal courts of the United States and tried for the violation of laws which are in their nature purely local and are not and never have been within the jurisdiction of Congress.

But, Mr. President, the people of the United States have at last gotten far enough away from the exciting struggle of 1861 to 1865 to begin to contemplate their own Constitution with reference to the blessings it may bring upon the land instead of the curses that it may yet be made to fasten upon individual men. And I hope that in whatever legislation we may attempt in Congress hereafter we shall be controlled and directed by a desire to benefit the country rather than by a desire to expose it again to harrowing investigations and criminal prosecutions, which it seems to me any man must see are of doubtful authority, and which the Supreme Court of the United States have said we have not the power to set on foot.

In my remarks made the day before yesterday I referred to the fact that every State in the South except Kentucky had amended its constitution so as to make it conformable to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. Now I propose to show the Senate a little of the work we have in hand whenever we undertake this matter of making the laws and constitutions of the different States of the American Union conform to our views of the rights of the citizens in those different States under the Constitution of the United States.

Kentucky, for instance, never abolished slavery; she refused to ratify the thirteenth amendment; and when you read her constitution you find the provisions in reference to slavery still there. Indeed, sir, you find them in the Constitution of the United States; for all the constitutional provisions in reference to the surrender of fugitive slaves remain in the Constitution of the United States, and slavery even is not impossible under our form of government at this day, because in the thirteenth amendment we made the reservation that a man might be enslaved as a punishment for crime, and therefore under the laws of the States, I suppose, or the laws of the United States a man might be enslaved as a punishment for crime under the thirteenth amendment. We may condemn a white man to slavery for denying a negro a right to vote, as a punishment for this newly created crime, if Congress has any power to punish such a denial on the part of an individual.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Everybody in State prison is in legal sense a slave.

Mr. MORGAN. No; he is put in prison as a punishment for an offense; his liberty of action is not taken away from him, it is only restrained for a time, and he is not deprived of the right to make a contract.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought everybody in prison for a felony was civilly dead and could not make a contract.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator said everybody who was in prison.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the State prison I said, in the penitentiary.

Mr. MORGAN. You may slay a man civilly for crime, and so you may put him in slavery for crime, but when you enslave him you do not slay him. When you enslave him you want him to live; you want him to be in a condition in which you can use him, not bury him. Servitude or slavery is not civil death. It may be equally as harrowing or torturing a penalty upon a man who has nice sensibilities, but it is not the same in fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The old legal slavery of the South was civil death was it not? The slaves could not contract or do anything else.

Mr. MORGAN. It was a denial that there had ever been any civil birth, not the taking away from a man of his civil life and civilly killing him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, the difference between not existing and death, I will not stop to consider.

Mr. MORGAN. It was the fact that the man when he came here came as a slave from his native land, was bought from slave-owners in his native land under a law of that country, brought into this country under the sanction of the Constitution of the United States, which not only impliedly sanctioned it, but expressly provided for its continuance for ten years after the year 1798. He came here a slave; he was never brought here, nor was any man ever brought here, that I am aware of, as a freeman, to be carried into slavery except those Indians in the Island of Cuba for whom our friends in the northeastern country swapped the negroes after they got them here, but were not satisfied with them. Those men might have been put to civil death by slavery; I think they were; but the institution as it existed in the South never involved that hideous feature. We never took a man who was free in his own country; we did not go and capture him there in his native woods and make a slave of him. We bought him from men who sold him to us. When our friends bought the Indians in Cuba they did not buy slaves; they bought freemen and made slaves of them, and so when they bought the Indians of the Narragansett tribe and others around there they bought freeman and made slaves of them, and sometimes transported them to Cuba and exchanged them for slaves, some of whom were Africans and some were Indians. There is the difference.

I refer to these things not for the purpose of bringing up unpleasant historical reminiscences, but for the purpose of illustrating by the facts of history a distinction which I am surprised the Senator has not seen, for there is scarcely a distinction in the world that is not absolutely visible to his eyes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly see the distinction of my honorable friend from Alabama always; that is too apparent to be misunderstood by anybody. But, if he will pardon me for this digression, I should like him to tell me what the difference is in respect of buying, as my friend says, his people did a colored man who was brought from Africa who was captured in Africa by a body of slave-hunters who went there for that purpose by force of the sword and the bayonet and the gunpowder and brought to the partaker who bought with a knowledge of how he came, and the case of the Indians that he states—whether he states it correctly or not I do not know, I should like to see a little more historical proof than he now presents; but taking that to be so what is the difference in the two cases and what great difference does it make, to come down to a practical point, to the slave himself whether he was bought and held in slavery or whether he was captured and held in slavery?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think it makes a particle of difference to the slave, and I am not quite sufficiently well versed in the conduct of those gentlemen at the North who went over and bought slaves abroad to dispute with the Senator historically on that subject. It is a matter I suppose he has studied out for himself very thoroughly, because the whole of that transaction was conducted through those among whom I suppose were the older people of his own country who carried on this traffic and brought the slaves from Africa. We have not familiarized ourselves with nice questions of historical reminiscence on this subject not having had the opportunity. We were not slave-hunters. We were slave-buyers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will pardon me on the subject of the responsibility of my country, as he calls it, for what his imagination has conjured up in respect to the Northeast. I wish to inform my honorable friend from Alabama that the State of Vermont, which happens to be my native land, was never anybody's country until it was its own, and that it was set up for itself before the independence of America was achieved. The Congress would not take it in, and of course it would not submit to the British king, but it had an independent government of its own as Texas had for a while before it came into this Union, and the first constitution of that State declared against any involuntary servitude, and the first slave that ever was attempted to be reclaimed for some southern owner in that State was brought before a judge, and that judge—I believe he was a Federal one, but I am not sure about that—declared that when the southern owner could show a bill of sale from God Almighty he could have the man and not before. That is the attitude that my particular constituents always occupied. The other Northeastern States can speak for themselves.

Mr. MORGAN. And I suppose that accounts very naturally for the fact that the Senator from Vermont in carrying out the views of his own people has always taken occasion to plant himself in the face of the Constitution of the United States whenever it is violated in his own State to gratify a public sentiment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think I have, Mr. President. That remains to be proved.

Mr. MORGAN. Your people, it seems, had no sort of idea of obeying that mandate in the Constitution which required the delivery up of fugitive slaves under its express requirements, and your celebrated judge, who had more respect for a bill of sale coming from God, when he knew that God was not in the habit of giving title papers, than he had for that oath which he took to support the Constitution of the United States, may be a sufficient model of judicial honor and propriety for the Senator from Vermont, but I thank God we have never had such a judge in the South, at least while we had judges who were not strangers in the land.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure it would have been so if I had been the judge; but my honorable friend who is so familiar with the course of judicial history ought not to forget that wherever the Constitution of the United States enforces duties it generally provides its own instruments for the execution of them, and whether it is the duty of a State tribunal to execute an act of Congress is a question that would require considerable discussion to prove. Therefore it does not necessarily follow that this judge in Vermont violated the Constitution of the United States on being called upon to exercise this function and refusing.

Mr. MORGAN. The Supreme Court of the United States has often decided that it was a violation of the Constitution of the United States to refuse to deliver a fugitive slave. Really I am quite aware of the fact that a very large part of the inciting motive to the struggle that took place between the South and North was an effort to get rid of or to disregard the effect of the Dred Scott decision. I regret that so small a circumstance as that should have ever led us to a feeling of such bitter animosity toward each other. If the spirit of obedience to the law as ruled by the great supreme judicial tribunal in this country was inculcated everywhere and every man was encouraged to feel and believe that it was his duty to assist in executing these decisions instead of trying to thwart them, perhaps we would have a much more amiable and peaceable time in the country than we have had in times past.

While we are on this subject of freemen and free negroes, &c., I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont for information, what is the meaning of the word "freemen" in the constitution of Vermont?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not prepared to answer.

Mr. MORGAN. Does it not mean a man who is not a slave?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know.

Mr. MORGAN. It is in the constitution of the Senator's own State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be there.

Mr. MORGAN. The word "freemen" is introduced in the constitution of that State as one of the qualifications of a voter. He must be a free man. In one of the amendments which they have adopted to that constitution the same term is used. I will read article 8:

> That all elections ought to be free and without corruption, and that all freemen, having a sufficient evidence, common interest with, and attachment to the community, have a right to elect officers and be elected into office, agreeably to the regulations made in this constitution.

Now, the Senator says he does not know what the word "freemen" means there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think now on reflection I can state one thing it means. It means to distinguish between free men and free women. I can see that far without further reflection.

Mr. MORGAN. That is a very nice distinction; a very small variation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is quite important sometimes.

Mr. MORGAN. We have got it now down to the difference between a free man and a free woman. Recollect this is the constitution of 1793. Everybody in the United States understands, I expect, at least would understand upon the mere reading of it, without the explanation of the Senator from Vermont, that it meant to contradistinguish a man who was free from a man who was not free, and not a man from a woman. I do not think there was any constitutional prescription put into the constitution of Vermont for the purpose of distinguishing a man from a woman. I think that was hardly a subject of ordination in that constitutional convention. The distinction was between free men and men who were not free. I will read section 21:

> Every man, of the full age of twenty-one years, having resided in this State for the space of one whole year next before the election of representatives, and is of a quiet and peaceable behavior, and will take the following oath or affirmation, shall be entitled to all the privileges of a freeman of this State:
> You solemly swear (or affirm) that whenever you give your vote or suffrage touching any matter that concerns the State of Vermont, you will do it so as in your conscience you shall judge will most conduce to the best good of the same, as established by the Constitution, without fear or favor of any man.

That is the solemn oath of a man who holds an office in the State of Vermont. There is a pledge of allegiance to the State of Vermont of the most peculiar character that I think I have ever read. When ever you go to vote, if you ever exercise the privilege of voting, you must do it as in your conscience "will most conduce to the best good of the same" the State of Vermont; there is but one thing needed to make it perfect, and that is that you shall so vote without reference to the Constitution of the United States or of any other State beside Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it does not happen to be there.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not there except by implication. It is an encouragement to those people to attend to their own business, which I am delighted to see is in their constitution. I have no doubt that some good will come of that some of these days. This constitution of 1793 was amended in 1828:

No person, who is not already a freeman of this State, shall be entitled to exercise the privilege of a freeman, unless he be a natural-born citizen of this or some one of the United States, or until he shall have been naturalized agreeably to the acts of Congress.

As late as 1828 the State of Vermont kept up this idea of freeman as contradistinguished from a man who was not free, notwithstanding that that State has always been so full of the spirit of freedom that a slave could not live upon its soil. A man who had ever been a slave could scarcely live there under the repressing influence of a constitution like that. If that very language was put into the constitution of Alabama to-morrow as it is to-day in the constitution of Vermont, I dare say that an army would be mustered in twenty-four hours and sent down there for the purpose of compelling us to strike it out. When, therefore, the Senator suggests to the Senate, as I suppose he will do some day, a further provision for the enforcement of the fifteenth amendment, having for its object the security of the rights of life, liberty, and property, and also the right of freedom on the part of all the citizens of the United States everywhere, I hope he will put in a clause which will make some impression upon the constitution of the State of Vermont.

Again, the State of Kentucky, as I was observing, still retains in her constitution all the provisions relating to slavery. These are all broken down by the force and effect of the Constitution of the United States, notwithstanding Kentucky refused to ratify the thirteenth amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the Senator gets to Kentucky, which came into the Union the same year Vermont did, I wish he would read that other clause of the constitution of Vermont on the subject of involuntary servitude and slavery. In the bill of rights I think he will find it.

Mr. MORGAN. In the bill of rights?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think so; that is, if the Senator is really serious in maintaining that there is now or ever was anything in the constitution of the State of Vermont that recognized, by implication or otherwise, the right of one man or set of men to enslave any other man or set of men, except on the judgment of a court to send them to prison or to a workhouse somewhere for crime.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not assumed, neither have I suggested at all, that the State of Vermont had ever committed itself to the doctrine that any man had a right to assume mastership or ownership over another under the system of laws relating to the institution of slavery. Not at all; but still the State of Vermont seems to have recognized the existence of such an institution. It seems to have recognized the fact when it used the word "freemen" to distinguish between men who were and men who were not free.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will read the other clause he will see that he is mistaken in that implication altogether.

Mr. MORGAN. If I am mistaken in that I can conceive of no purpose that word has in that constitution; and I certainly cannot understand that the Senator from Vermont has lived but a brief lifetime even under that constitution with that word always before him, and which was reincorporated in the amendment made in 1828, and never has made a protest against its existence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend is really serious about this business, and I now perceive he is, just let me suggest to him that, if he reads the clause in the bill of rights, which declares that slavery or involuntary servitude being contrary to human rights and the law of God, &c., shall never be tolerated for a moment, he can find an explanation of the meaning of the word "freemen" not only as distinguishing between the sexes in the exercise of political rights, but also in respect of those who are lawfully restrained of their liberty as a punishment for crime, because people who are in the State prison and jails under sentence in our State are not thought to be worthy members of community to exercise political rights in voting. That, if my friend is serious, I will state to him is the serious explanation of the use of the word.

Mr. MORGAN. The little debate which we have had on the subject of Vermont and its constitution could all have been saved if the Senator in the outset instead of saying that he did not know what the word "freemen" meant, and undertaking to say that it was a distinction between man and woman, had said that it referred to persons who were restrained of their liberty in consequence of punishment for crime.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Frankness requires me to say to the Senator that I told him at that moment the simple truth, for I had not thought of it for twenty years.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt about the Senator's telling the truth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But hearing my honorable friend's discussion, and finding it to be serious, I can readily on a moment's reflection supply to him the answer.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt at all about the Senator's entire sincerity in what he has said on this subject, but I was greatly surprised that he should not have understood what the meaning of the word "freemen" was in that constitution so as easily to have given an explanation to the Senate, and I was disturbed by it, not that I desire at any time to go to Vermont or to send anybody there from Congress or elsewhere to ask the people of Vermont to reform their constitution, but I could not help thinking that if we were probably so unfortunate in Alabama as to use such a word as that in our constitution what a terrible fate would be visited upon us through some act of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Your constitution used the words "free white men," I think; did it not?

Mr. MORGAN. It did; but before the Congress of the United States proposed to us an amendment on this subject we held our State convention and struck out slavery. That is the sort of readiness we have shown in accepting the situation and conforming to it. There is nothing in our State constitution to-day which is against the most rigid theory of the anti-slavery party, nor is there anything there which is against the most rigid theory of the anti-secession party; for we have said in our constitution in Alabama that we have not the right of secession. All the Northern States have retained the right if they ever had it. Not one of them has ever stricken it out as I believe. In Massachusetts it is a question of interpretation. Massachusetts thought she had the right in 1812 and 1813. She thought it was her right and she insisted that it was. She first started the idea in the United States Government which unfortunately we undertook to ingraft upon our institutions, the result of which has been so disastrous to us that we have stopped taking lessons in that school.

I wish, Mr. President, to show the extreme jealousy of the different States in the American Union in reference to this right of voting. I want to show how in every constitution of every State in the American Union there is a separate chapter or article on the subject of the elective franchise or suffrage, and to show how the various States have in their organic law made provision, sometimes by positive ordination and sometimes by making room for legislative action, so that the right to vote in these different States might conform to the peculiar idiosyncrasies of different people; as, for instance, in the State of Colorado. I will commence, however, with Kansas. The constitution of that State provides that—

Every white male person, of twenty-one years and upward, belonging to either of the following classes, who shall have resided in Kansas six months next preceding any election, and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote at least thirty days next preceding such election, shall be deemed a qualified elector.

The free State of Kansas lying right west of Missouri in the bosom of that magnificent plain, where we supposed that the spirit of liberty would sweep over the people like the free winds sweep over the plains, has yet got the word "white" in her constitution. Shall we send some missionary or some congressional commission over there for the purpose of investigating that subject and having the word "white" stricken out of the constitution of Kansas? That is a good republican State, living yet under a slave constitution. The constitution thus executed in Kansas or attempted to be executed in Kansas would prevent a negro from voting in that State, if the effort were successful, and who would we punish then for this transgression of the fifteenth amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the date of that constitution?

Mr. MORGAN. Eighteen hundred and fifty-nine, the last one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was in the time of a democratic Congress. I am very sorry it allowed the State to come in under such a constitution.

Mr. MORGAN. The democratic Congress always had respect for the rights of all persons in all parts of the United States which were guaranteed by the Constitution, and though there was many a democrat in the North averse to the institution of slavery, and who would liked to have seen it wiped out, he never felt that he had a right to do it until the Constitution was amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does my friend mean to say that the democrats of the United States as a body believed that slavery could lawfully exist in the Territories, and that Congress had no power to prevent it? Kansas being a Territory, and no State being entitled to admission into the Union as a State except by the consent of Congress, why was Congress bound to approve slavery?

Mr. MORGAN. So many of the old-time democrats who were such before the war have found their way into the republican party that I do not have the same privilege of speaking of them now that I used to. If I felt at liberty to speak about them I might say something that would hurt their feelings, and therefore I had better not discuss a subject that runs so far away from the point of my argument.

The Senator's inquiry reminds me of a little matter that occurred in Alabama. An old gentleman who was a very devout democrat used to listen to my friend Pugh down there, an eloquent and a splendid democrat, argue the Kansas and Nebraska question. His boys went into the war, and all or nearly all of them were killed. He gave up his negroes and all the property he had, but he was very cheerful about it. Finally one day after the war was over he thought he would come to town, having been secluded for a long time; but before coming he thought he would rehabilitate himself, and he went to his carriage driver Jack, who had been made a justice of the peace, and he got Jack to take him back into the Union by administering an oath of allegiance, as was then prescribed by the republican party to us. Feeling himself thoroughly rehabilitated, and doubtless very much refreshed, he came to town to see his old friend Pugh. "Well," said he, "Pugh, we have got through the war." "Yes," said Pugh, "we have." Said he, "my niggers are all gone, Pugh." "Yes," was the reply. "And my money is all gone; and my bank-stock; and I am old, and the old woman is old, and those poor boys of mine, they are all lying in their graves. I have got a great deal to regret, but nothing to take back. But," said he, "there is one thing I should like to know of you, Pugh. What has become of the New-braska question?" [Laughter.] The Senator from Vermont seems to be in hot search this morning of the "New-braska question," and he wants to know what has become of that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no, Mr. President, my good friend brings forward the Nebraska question himself by the democratic constitution of Nebraska or Kansas of 1859, and supports it by his Alabama anecdote.

I can only say that I wish everybody in the South felt just as that good old man did, who took a sincere oath of allegiance to his old coachman.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will come down to Alabama he will discover that the whole people of Alabama, almost without exception, feel just as that old man did. When they gave up sons and negroes, and everything of the kind, they uttered a brief sigh over the subject, and turned their backs upon it forever. They have no bitterness and no animosity at all in reference to the war or its losses, because, like men, they fully accepted the result, and having sustained defeat, they have buried their recollection of their losses with all their grievances in oblivion forever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are all for equal rights?

Mr. MORGAN. All for equal rights.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They will favor my resolutions, then.

Mr. MORGAN. They want to get their equal rights from the proper source. They do not want them from the hands of the Senator from Vermont as a Congressman here. They would rather go to their own Legislature and State constitution and get their rights from the fountain source of authority where their fathers did. There is the issue; there is the difference between us. The Senator is determined he will give us something he considers equal rights. We prefer to have the judgment of those who live among us and know us better than he seems desirous of knowing us, and who have feelings of greater sympathy and commiseration for us than the Senator from Vermont. So much for that.

California amended her constitution in 1862, during the war, and she made no change in her previous constitution; in which she had the word "white" as a requisite of the right to vote.

Every white male citizen of the United States and every white male citizen of Mexico, &c.—

Having other qualifications, shall be entitled to vote.

The constitution of Connecticut is a very good one indeed. That State without such a constitution never would have produced such men as we see here. That State would never have produced such a democrat for instance as my friend who is now absent from his seat [Mr. EATON] unless the people of Connecticut had been under a wise and good constitution, one adapted to their own people, one calculated to bring forward civilization, to establish all the valuable institutions that have in them rich benefactions for mankind. When I read the provisions of the constitution of that State I do not read complainingly; I do not read with the idea that I or any other man ought to undertake to interfere with it, but I read it for the purpose of showing that it would be a very poor constitution for the people of the section of country in which I live; and if we were to attempt even in Alabama to adopt it or had ever adopted it, we should have had armies and navies there for the purpose of repealing it.

The constitution of Connecticut provides that—

All persons who have been, or shall hereafter, previous to the ratification of this constitution, be admitted freemen, according to the existing laws of this State, shall be electors.

SEC. 2. Every white male citizen of the United States who shall have gained a settlement in this State, attained the age of twenty-one years, and resided in the town in which he may offer himself to be admitted to the privilege of an elector at least six months preceding, and have a freehold estate of the yearly value of $7 in this State; or, having been enrolled in the militia, shall have performed military duty therein for the term of one year next preceding the time he shall offer himself for admission, or, being liable thereto, shall have been, by authority of law, excused therefrom, or shall have paid a State tax within the year next preceding the time he shall present himself for such admission, and shall sustain a good moral character, shall, on his taking such oath as may be prescribed by law, be an elector.

What would have become of the carpet-baggers who went down South if they had been required to sustain and prove a good moral character, not only before they voted but before they took possession of the States? It would have been a happy thing for us if we had had such a constitution as that; but if we had dared to exercise our rightful authority as a coequal of Massachusetts in this great Union in the ordination of such a constitution as that, bayonets would have bristled around us and heavy artillery would have been trained upon us, and we would not have been permitted to do it.

I was going to read from the constitution of Delaware, that good, old-fashioned State which has scarcely crept out of the shell of her old British character as yet, and the conservatism she has exercised in her institutions, her laws, and over her people has produced perhaps as good a population as can be found in the United States, and has contributed immensely to the credit of the Senate of the United States and to the welfare of the people of the entire country. Delaware has in her constitution to-day the words "free white male citizen of the age of twenty-two years," as a qualification of a voter. Indiana has a similar requisition: Maryland has a similar one. Massachusetts I will notice. No man who wants to get a good example of life and who wants to understand all the essential arts of success would in any manner pass by Massachusetts without observing upon her constitution. The amendment to the constitution of 1780, ratified in 1857, is the first one to which I shall call attention:

No person shall have the right to vote, or be eligible to office under the constitution of this Commonwealth, who shall not be able to read the constitution in the English language, and write his name: Provided, however, That the provisions of this amendment shall not apply to any person prevented by a physical disability from complying with its requisitions, nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any persons who shall be sixty years of age or upward at the time this amendment shall take effect.

It is said, and I suppose is so meant, in the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont, that the Constitution of the United States in the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments confers citizenship upon the negro, and with citizenship the right to vote, and the attempt is made here, or I suppose it will be made, to deraign that right to vote from the Constitution of the United States through these two amendments. The constitution of Massachusetts prescribes that a man to have the right to vote there shall be able to read the constitution in the English language and write his name. Suppose one of the black citizens of my State should go to Massachusetts to settle, who cannot write his name and cannot read the constitution of Massachusetts and he should dare attempt to vote there, would it be understood in Massachusetts or here either that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments repealed that part of the constitution of that State as to a negro and left it standing as to a white man; that a white man who went from Alabama to Massachusetts would not have the right to vote unless he could read and write, while a negro who went there would have the right to vote under the guarantee of the fifteenth amendment, whether or not he could read or write? There is a fair and just presentation of the question involved in the debate between the Senator from Vermont and myself, and in his resolutions.

It was proper in Massachusetts to have this provision in the constitution of that State. Massachusetts saw the necessity of educating the great masses of the people upon whose enlightened convictions and on whose honest and enlightened judgment and conduct free institutions at last have to be based, and she has held to this provision in her constitution year after year, amid the jeers and complainings of other States and other people, I might say with almost heroic persistence, believing it to be necessary for the welfare of that great and distinguished Commonwealth. But as to Alabama, if we should undertake to incorporate this provision into our State constitution, I dare say the whole republican party of the United States would rise as one man to denounce the iniquity of putting a condition upon the people of Alabama that they should be able to read their own constitution and write before they could vote, for it would be understood in all republican circles that we intended to disfranchise the great mass of the negro population. That is what would be said to us; and who can conjecture what would not be done to us for assuming to enjoy so much of sacred liberty?

They have a constitution in Massachusetts that could not exist in Alabama for the reason that the Congress of the United States would not allow it to exist there. Can Congress come in between us and equalize these rights and privileges under the Constitution of the United States so as to take from Massachusetts this provision of her constitution or so as to prevent us from adopting it? Sir, there is no such power. When such power is exercised in this country, then there is usurpation on the part of Congress which is absolutely destructive of the individuality, the independence, and the sovereignty of the different States. Gentlemen, while they are voting upon resolutions which contain broad and high-sounding declarations about constitutional law, would do well to inquire when these principles are carried into final effect what may be the result upon their own States. We are not afraid of them so far as we are concerned. You may take a few of our people and land them in the penitentiary or lock them up in jails to add some higher sanctity to the sacred names of liberty and justice, but our constitution is so framed that it is out of the reach of any disturbance. It cannot be made wider than it is; it cannot be made freer than it is; it cannot be made less objectionable to the demands of the republican party than it is. We have surrendered everything in our constitution except simply the right of local self-government. We do not ask any State in any part of the Union to surrender anything at all. We do not ask the Senator from Vermont to give up his freemen restrictions, nor we do not ask Kansas to strike "white" out of her constitution. We do not ask Connecticut to strke out of her constitution the provisions there which are so favorable to her progress and sustentation. We do not ask Massachusetts to strike out the provision of disqualification because a man cannot read and write. Let them all stand; let every community, every State, judge for itself that which is best to make it not merely a contributor to the general welfare of the people of the United States, but a contributor also to the general welfare, the enlightenment, the prosperity, the Christianization, and the civilization of the entire world. Leave them free and let them be trusted as men ought to be trusted in the land of this great "composite race" which is leading all the hosts now moving in the march of civilization and intellectual triumph, and whose splendid conquests are decorating the entire world with the trophies of art, science, and industry.

Peculiarities exist in the constitutions of different States not yet mentioned by me, in Michigan, Nevada, New Hampshire, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin. I will not detain the Senate, though I intended when I took the floor this morning to have done so, by reading from these different State constitutions the provisions relative to the subject. I have long enough dwelt upon this subject to bring it to the attention of the Senate, and I dare say it is a subject which in the further discussion of these matters will be somewhat elaborated. I will therefore close my remarks before I intended to have done so according to the programme which I had arranged in my own mind for the argument of this grave subject.

The resolutions of the Senator from Vermont are too broad in their sweep, they are too indefinite in their expressions, they are too complex in their arrangment, they are too concealed to enable me to give to them my sanction. They are unnecessary because they do not suggest any necessary measures of legislation. No good can grow out of the adoption of them because they are confined simply to the expression of the opinion of the Senate and do not ask the concurrence of the House in anything. They seem to have been brought forward in the Senate for no other purpose than merely to gain an expression of opinion. We have the opportunity to give enough of expression of opinion here in the form of votes upon measures of substantial value and advantage to this country not to use the public time, it seems to me, in the expression of opinions upon questions which are non-essential and must be fruitless of good to the people.

The resolutions as I have undertaken to portray them, for I have had to gather their substance from the reading of them simply and not through any explanation given by the Senator from Vermont, it seems to me mingle and confuse together certain premises and deductions which bear no legitimate and logical relation the one to the other. The premises themselves in some instances I have undertaken to show are faulty; the deductions are not logical; but on the contrary there is a vast gap between the premises laid in the first resolution and the conclusions drawn in the second.

The substitute which I have had the honor to bring before the Senate is copied almost literally from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. The question remains for the Senate to determine whether they will accept the suggestions of the Senator from Vermont in the form in which he chooses to present them here, whether or not his ipse dixit shall become the law of the Senate and, as far as we have influence upon it, the law of the land, or whether, on the other hand, we will take the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, a co-ordinate tribunal and department in this great Government, and follow that decision at least until we find that it carries us upon some hidden rock or some unknown shore.

What is the office and function of the Supreme Court? Why was it put in the Constitution as one of the departments of this Government? Why are its jurisdiction and powers expressly mentioned in the body of the Constitution, as also are the powers of the Executive and of Congress? Why was it made one of the great elemental powers and departments of this Government if it is to have no influence upon the destiny of the Government except to decide mere rights of meum and tuum controversies between private individuals that cannot bind the States or the Congress? Sir, I must discard if I do not denounce the doctrine that the Congress of the United States, or the Senate of the United States, taking it as a separate body, have the right to define the boundaries of their own jurisdiction contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States as they are declared by the Supreme Court of this country. Whenever we sanction a doctrine of that kind we sanction the doctrine of legislative usurpation. The next step in the progress is to say, "We do not care what the Supreme Court has decided; we ourselves have jurisdiction, and having the right to declare the extent and limits of our jurisdiction we will declare it against the judgment of the Supreme Court." A law has been passed here of some important public character, as very many laws have been. The Supreme Court in a case made between two individuals residing in different States, or between a State and the people of another State, or it may be between two States, has taken the subject under advisement and consideration, has heard argument upon it, and has decided that the law of Congress is null and void because it violates the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which decision was that?

Mr. MORGAN. Many decisions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator think the Cruikshank decision is one of them?

Mr. MORGAN. I was not referring to that case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Vermont undertake to say that the Supreme Court has never declared void a law of Congress?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no, I do not undertake to say that.

Mr. MORGAN. Would the Senator in the face of such a decision re-enact the law?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would, if I thought it right to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. You would?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Most decidedly.

Mr. MORGAN. Then there is the difference between us, and that difference is not going to be forgotten. There is the great point of issue between us. You would re-enact the law if you thought it constitutional, though the Supreme Court had decided to the reverse. I would not. There is the difference between us, and there, Mr President, is the difference between the Senator's resolutions and mine. There the whole pith and core of the subject is. As he was ready in reference to the Dred Scott decision, the Senator is ready now, to fly in the face of any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which abridges his powers in this Senate and declares void his legislative acts. I, on the contrary, believe that this Government is to be maintained in all of its parts and all of its departments. I believe that this Government is a government which when it was first put in operation was balanced between three great departments of the country. I believe that the right of final judgment upon all questions of constitutional law was given to the judiciary, and when we take that power of final judgment away, and after they have decided against us, we reassert the laws and undertake to put them in force, we do nothing more than to go back to that which of all others was the most provoking cause of trouble in this country, the higher law; and the question to-day is as presented by the Senator in his remarks and his resolutions, simply a question between the higher law and the Constitution of the United States.

As this great Senator leads his hosts from the field of defeat, flying before the decree of the people, he cannot give up the struggle as he marches out of power, until he has put his shield behind him and hurled his Parthian arrows back upon the column of the people who are approaching under constitutional banners. He wants to break the Constitution down and assert his higher law wherever and whenever he pleases. I had supposed that the experience of the last twenty years had rather put a wet blanket upon the subject of a higher law in this country. We will never fight you for it again; we will never war against you for it again under this Government or any other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think you warred against it.

Mr. MORGAN. We fought you as we thought outside, but now we will stand inside of this Government claiming this constitutional organization, claiming its powers, claiming the just distribution of those powers between the different departments, and by appealing to the great heart of the people, by appealing to the enlightened consciences of Americans, we will re-engage in this battle again, not with arms, but with persuasion, with argument, with importunity, and imploration. We beg you not to bring back that aggravating cause of disturbance between the States of this Union. Do not assert your right because you and I are members of the Senate and also members of Congress to go to Massachusetts and compel the honorable Senator who sits at your side [Mr. HOAR] to take out of the constitution of his State that provision which relates to the ability of a man to read the constitution and to write his name, and thereby disfranchise thousands of voters; because when you turn loose this spirit of higher law there is no check; there is no restraint to it. A law that is higher than the Constitution is higher than everything else. A law that is higher than the Constitution is such a law as impelled republicanism in the latter part of the last century in France to overturn governments and institutions and in their place inaugurated bloodshed, the guillotine, the prison, and universal destruction. While the Senator, if he had taken his legitimate part in this discussion and had opened it, might not have committed himself openly to these doctrines, yet in the colloquy with me to which he has been provoked while I have been upon the floor he has disclosed at last his contempt of the Supreme Court and his intention to place the powers of the Constitution of the country again in conflict with the doctrine of a higher law, espousing the higher law and assuming its championship against the Constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I only want to say just now, because it has not any legitimate connection with the resolutions that are before the Senate, that my notions of constitutional law and of higher law only differ from those of the Senator from Alabama in the way of applying them. I do not believe in the right of a party against whom the Supreme Court of the United States has pronounced judgment to resist the execution of that judgment by force on the theory of a higher law. I believe that it is his duty to submit. There may be possible exceptions to that; I am only now speaking of the general rule. But I do believe that it is not higher law, but fidelity to the Constitution of the United States, that compels me, on my oath as a Senator, when I am called upon to pass a law, to be my own judge on my own oath and conscience and intelligence of whether the Constitution permits me to pass such a law or not. In considering whether I ought to pass it in the light of the Constitution, I should pay great respect to any judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States that should bear upon that question. I should approach the passage of a law that should differ from their opinions in the light of the Constitution with great reluctance; but if after fair consideration and due deliberation and study it should be my opinion that that law was warranted by the Constitution, and that the public expediency and good also required it to be passed, I should believe that I was a perjurer to my oath if I failed to pass it because of the opinion of a co-ordinate branch of the Government.

It is scarcely necessary to cite illustrations, but I will take one. Suppose the Supreme Court of the United States should decide that it was the judge of the elections and qualifications of members of this body, and should upon a suit, before a man had got his seat here, by another man instituted in the name of a State, so that it would have original jurisdiction on the face of the Constitution, undertake to decide that A and not B was the true member of this body, would anybody maintain, even my honorable friend from Alabama, that that opinion could have the slightest effect upon my duty here?

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say one word. I would not say that such a decision was valid, because the Supreme Court had violated its constitutional jurisdiction in taking cognizance of the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly; that is the case.

Mr. MORGAN. All the remarks I made are in reference to a decision made by the Supreme Court, within the limits of their constitutional jurisdiction, upon a question relating to the people of different States, individuals, property, boundary-lines between the States. Within the express jurisdiction given them in the Constitution of the United States they have the right to make final decisions which we cannot question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes. Then we have got right on one part of the broad proposition of my honorable friend, and that is that where the Supreme Court of the United States decide against the Constitution we are not bound to regard it; where they decide according to the Constitution, we are. So say I. The question is, who is to judge? Where the Constitution imposes upon us the duty of passing laws just as it does the duty of deciding upon the qualifications and elections of our own members, and not otherwise, is it to be said that the Supreme Court can invade the duty that the Constitution has charged upon us and decide in advance whether we are authorized to pass a particular law or not?

I do not need to pursue it now, Mr. President. I only wanted to get myself out of the apparent bad public repute that my small fortunes would be in as being held up as a person who would defy not only the Supreme Court but the Constitution for the sake of some imaginary higher law. I do not wish to occupy that ground.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. Before the question is taken on the original resolutions, or on the amendment, I have a few words to say.

Mr. RANSOM. Will the Senator from Delaware give way to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest an executive session. I do not urge going on now.

Mr. RANSOM. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BAYARD. I give way for that purpose.

Mr. RANSOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 1, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FORT CLARK, TEXAS.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 1627) making appropriation for the purchase of Fort Clark, Texas, be taken from the Speaker's table for the purpose of being referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There was no objection, and the bill (S. No. 1627) was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. SAYLER. I call for the regular order.

MAGGIE BARRON AND OTHERS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour, which commences at seventeen minutes past twelve o'clock; and the House resumes as the unfinished business of the morning hour the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6131) for the relief of Maggie Barron, Henry P. Gorman, and Walter Gorman, children and heirs at law of George Gorman, deceased. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ACKLEN. I ask the gentleman from Texas to yield to me for a moment that I may make a request.

Mr. MILLS. If it comes out of my time I cannot yield. Every moment I have is disposed of.

Mr. ACKLEN. I will not occupy two minutes of the gentleman's time. I merely desire to have a matter disposed of.

Mr. MILLS. I decline to yield for that purpose. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.]

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, I care nothing for the payment of southern war claims to southern loyalists, for if they were loyal then to the Union, they were disloyal to everything that I held dear. But that there were men in the South who were faithful to the flag of the Union in the midst of a terrible trial to their faith is unquestionably true, and I do not envy the cheap political capital that a Union soldier can make by telling such men that he has no more confidence in their honesty than a mouse has in a dead cat stuffed with straw. Under the rules of civilized warfare, which supplanted the barbarous usages of Tamerlane and Ghengis Khan, every nation has paid to individuals in the enemy's country for supplies taken to subsist their armies in the field. This Government refused to pay such claims to enemies in the South, but resolved to pay all such claims when presented by loyal men within two years when their loyalty could be established in its own courts. The claim now under consideration comes from minors and women, against whom statutes of limitation seldom run, and the Committee on War Claims has recommended that their claim shall be heard and adjudged by the courts, notwithstanding the bar of the statute of limitations. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] objects, and taking advantage of the well-known opposition everywhere to war claims, seeks to blend them with claims for southern improvements, and endeavors to throw the odor of his dead cat over all demands coming from the South.

With a remarkable tendency to suspect fraud, he declares himself in advance unwilling to trust the honesty of either the claimants or the court. Such readiness to suspect corruption in others sometimes indicates an innate tendency to corruption in ourselves, and I am therefore not willing to charge corruption upon other men. I am here to do justice to all claimants, I hope without passion and without prejudice. The war and its issues are certainly dead with me. I have now but one political faith, and that is to preserve inviolate our local self-government; and but one political hope, and that is to build up the waste places in the South made desolate in war.

During last session I called attention to the difference in the spirit exhibited by northern republicans to improve a republican South and northern democrats to improve a democratic South. I now call attention to the speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] not the one toned down in the RECORD next day, but the one made here and partially published in the New York Herald, and contrast it with the declarations of another distinguished Union soldier from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR,] both of which appeared in the RECORD of the same day. In the RECORD he speaks as follows:

Mr. BRAGG. The gentleman from North Carolina says that 95 per cent. of the population of the South were true to the confederacy. That recalls to my mind the very eloquent remarks made yesterday by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.] I was astonished that a claim so exceedingly loyal as this should find the gentleman from Mississippi as its champion. When did the Vicksburgh district before send a man here who represented the loyal people of that district, who should stand here and sing praises and chant paeans in honor of the loyal Southerners. [Laughter.] Ay, when I heard that speech, and saw in my mind's eye the long array of loyal claimants, and thought of their antecedents, I felt like saying to them what the mouse said when it saw the old cat hanging up against the wall: "Oh, you are there, my old friend, are you? You may stay there, for I would not trust you though your skin was stuffed with straw." [Laughter.]

Mr. CHALMERS. I would like to say to the gentleman that my colleague [Mr. HOOKER] is now out. He kept quiet the other day when my colleague was present. I do not think he should assail him behind his back.

Mr. BRAGG. It is not my purpose to assail any man; but if the gentleman says that I say behind his back what I would not say to his face, he mistakes the man whom he calls to order.

I beg pardon of the House if I have improperly alluded to the speech which the gentleman from Mississippi made yesterday in support of this claim; but I have got tired of seeing claims come here in one form, which, when this House expresses its sense upon them, are suddenly diverted into another channel, and of hearing persons talk about judicial examining and making laws fixing the rules of evidence to tie up the court, and then send the matter to accounting officers to determine what the value of the property taken was.

I would like to remind the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] how he quoted in his famous speech against the William and Mary College the well-settled law that no nation is responsible for the torts of its officers or soldiers, for the destruction of property in the course of war in insurrectionary territory; but, as I said, there has been in this House repeatedly a taunt thrown at us, and I regret to say that it comes from Mississippi.

We have been taunted with the $34,000,000 in the Treasury that belong to some one unknown or to the Government as proceeds of abandoned property and ought to be distributed in the South.

I would ask these gentlemen to take their eyes off from the $34,000,000 for a moment if they want to appreciate how we feel. Let them turn the glass over and look at another view—a sea of blood—thousands and tens of thousands of the best men in the land, North and South, weltering in their gore. Let them hear the cries of the wounded man from the battle-field as the cold chill of death strikes him, and by the cessation of the groans you knew that one more soul had gone to his final account.

Let them go and hear the piteous moans from the hospitals; let them go to the hill-sides and mountain-tops and to the valleys where thousands and hundreds of thousands are in mourning.

Then let them look at what is of the least account in the reckoning, the thousands of millions, the billions of money that were spent to put down this war; and when they place all these on the debtor side of the account, I would like to have them strike the balance—show, if they can, that the $34,000,000 of credit which belongs to somebody, they do not know whom, overcome the entries on the debit side.

I am not willing to sit here as the Representative of my constituents and allow these measures to be brought up in one form or another; from one member and another; from one committee and another, for the purpose of getting money out of the Treasury on the plea of loyalty.

These loyal men of the South are so few that the evil that will be done by leaving them out is nothing in comparison with the great evil that will be done if we open the door and allow the $17,000,000 for claims upon our Calendar to be passed and appropriations made for the benefit of men on the plea that they were loyal people of the South.

I have here time and again heard a threat thrown to the democracy upon this side of the House which I have thought for a long time needed an answer, and it came from Mississippi. I have heard it said here upon the floor of the House that unless the democracy of the North is more liberal, that unless they would open their hands and give out money more lavishly from the Treasury, the solid South would soon go over to the other side.

I say, as one of the Representatives of the democracy of the North, that if there are any men in the South who propose to belong to the democratic party simply for the reason that the doors of the Treasury are to be opened to them, the sooner they go over the better for them, the better for our party; and when the people of this country see and feel, as they are beginning to do, that they can trust the interests of the country with the democratic party of the North and South, then we can make recruits in the Northern States that will fill up our ranks to the maximum.

We have no need of that class of gentlemen that we can only hold to party allegiance by golden ties, by giving them the promise of everything which they may ask out of the Treasury.

He is more correctly reported in the New York Herald, as follows:

He, representing the democrats of the North, would say that if there was a man who professed to belong to the democracy of the South simply for the reason that the doors of the Treasury were to be opened to them, the sooner they went over the better for them and the better for the democratic party. When the people of the country felt that they could trust the Treasury and the interests of the Government with the democratic party, with no danger of the democrats of the North selling out body and soul to the democrats of the South, that party could gather recruits in the Northern States that would fill up its ranks to the maximum, and it would have no need of that class of gentlemen whom it could hold only by giving them all they wanted.

The gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR,] speaking of the Texas and Pacific Railroad, while opposed to the bill reported, said:

I have no doubts of the power of Congress, in its discretion, to make this appropriation, nor would I from any motive withhold from the great South or Southwest any boon which I would ask for other portions of our vast domain. The man who has not survived the hates of the war should have perished in it. We are, thank God! one people, and only one people. I pity the man who cannot see through and beyond this solid South and the wrongs by which she became and seeks to remain so, and the North rapidly solidifying in self-defense and for the rights of humanity, a solid nation, as indivisible and perpetual as the mountain-chains which bind them together, or the rolling girdle with which the Father of Waters forever clasps the teeming bosom of his bride.

The sun of our Austerlitz rose on the clouds of war, but has set in the glories of victory; and when this night of turbulent transition shall have passed away, as it will pass away, so sure as the revolutions of the universe proceed, the sun of peace and union will stand still in our heavens, not while some brief mortal wills it, but a full-orbed star, blazing in the zenith so long as the planet itself is inhabited by mankind.

And, sir, I would vote for any wise and necessary measure which will enlarge our commerce abroad as well as at home; any measure which will open to us new markets for the productions of every industry, whether northern or western or southern, or which will increase the demand for them, wherever one now exists, provided that individual or corporate enterprise is unable to accomplish the desired result.

When the West was in its infancy it was nurtured by the South with a fostering hand. Southern democrats aided Douglas on his Illinois Central Railroad bill. And when Mr. Pierce vetoed the bill to improve the Saint Clair Flats, very similar to the bill for the improvement of the Mississippi River, it was passed in a democratic Senate by a two-third vote over the veto, and Mississippi democrats stood by the democracy of Michigan.

Recently, when I was nominated for Congress the convention indorsed the Texas Pacific and at the same time the Northern Pacific Railroad bill.

I warned northern democrats last session that a refusal to recognize the just demands of the South might result in the defeat of southern democrats and the sending of other Representatives here who would form alliances with other parties. The rapid growth of independent candidates in the South has already sustained my declaration. I do not now take back a single line nor a single word of what I then uttered; but, recognizing that there are two classes of democrats and two of republicans, I repeat what I then said, that I hope the solid South may still be solid for the democratic party, but for that portion of it which has the courage and manliness to treat us as equals and not as inferiors in this Union.

The gentleman from Wisconsin, after having slept on my speech almost a year and after "nursing his wrath to keep it warm," now comes forward to excommunicate me from the democratic church and to give a general ticket-of-leave to all southern men who dare to ask justice and an equal distribution of appropriations from the Federal Treasury. He assumes to speak in the name of the northern democrats, and even if he had authority thus to speak I must say that this is the first time I ever heard of a minority undertaking to turn out the majority of a party. But this great leader from the solid democratic State of Wisconsin now proposes to show me to the door of the democratic party; and when the South asks but a small proportion of the Government aid that has been given to the North he treats her like a mendicant, and, with all the arrogance of Diedrich Von Beekman to old Rip Van Winkle in his own house, says, "Give her a cold potato and let her go." He proclaimed as the representative of northern democrats that they would not sell out body and soul to southern democrats. He rather intimated that he could do better and get more recruits in the North without a solid South than with it.

But, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know who made him the salesman of the northern democracy. I would like to know how many northern democrats he could deliver if he could find a purchaser, and I would especially like to know where he would find a purchaser for such democrats as he has shown himself to be. During the revolutionary war, when the British held the city of New York and our troops were encamped some distance above, there were guerrilla bands operating between the lines that were called "the Cow Boys and the Skinners." They were composed of deserters from both armies, and while they belonged to neither side they robbed indiscriminately from both and fled in the utmost terror when danger approached.

The gentleman from Wisconsin reminds me of these bands. He strikes first on one side and then on the other; but whenever a question comes up requiring the fearless courage of manhood to do justice to the South he rushes in frantic terror into the ranks of the most stalwart republicans to shelter his political head. If such men are democrats, I would like to know upon what principle of democracy they stand. When the war was over democratic soldiers met again as friends, and were ready to forgive on both sides; and when republicanism undertook to press the result of the war beyond the restoration of the Union and to the utter destruction of States' rights, men who had fought to save the Union said "Stop!" The new principle of the democratic party was peace and restoration—that the dead past might bury its dead, and that the bloody shirt should wave alone from the flag-pole of republican bummers. But the gentleman from Wisconsin has found a bloodier shirt than ever waved from the battlements of the republican party, and he is stretching his legs in a frantic effort to climb up to the republican platform and rob them of their last banner. He says, when we talk to him about thirty-four millions in the Treasury, the proceeds of captured and abandoned property, which the Supreme Court has held belongs to Southern citizens, but which they are barred from obtaining by a statute of limitations, that he will remind us of the war debt and the blood of Union soldiers for which the South is responsible. I would remind the gentleman that the war debt is not yet paid, and that the cotton and tobacco States have paid and are now paying far more of this debt than the State which he represents.

And as he has demanded a balance of accounts to be struck, I would ask him to calculate the value of four millions of slaves set free, the princely estates destroyed, the millions paid in pensions to Union soldiers and the decoration of national cemeteries, and the millions yet to be paid under the back-pension bill recently adopted, in all of which we bear our full proportion, and he will find that the balance of accounts is as largely in our favor as the difference in appropriations for internal improvements have been against us. But when the gentleman pleads the blood of Union soldiers as a set-off against the repayment of our money unlawfully taken since the war, he has reached a depth that the bitterest republican in the House has not yet descended to. With the skill of a camp-meeting funeral exhorter he harrows up our souls with a fearful picture of "a sea of blood," hecatombs of mangled bodies weltering in their gore, the groans of the dying and the cold chill of death, and asks us to look on this picture that we may not claim the money filched from our pockets. Like the junior member of "Quirk, Gammon, & Snap" he demands a pecuniary salve to soothe his wounded spirit. If his argument means anything, it means that we are to remain as inferiors in this Union, branded with the mark of Cain, with no rights except to pay taxes, and no powers except to fill offices with northern democrats. If he is a democrat I am not.

One word more, Mr. Speaker, and I am done with this subject. The gentleman talked very flippantly about men in the South who professed to belong to the democratic party. If I am correctly informed he has made professions on both sides; and I would reply to his summary dismissal of a certain supposed class of southern democrats that if there are any sore-headed or disappointed republicans in the North who cannot get into Congress without putting on the lion's skin of democracy, they should be very careful not to open their mouths too wide when they get here.

Mr. HOOKER addressed the House. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I had agreed to yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY] whom I do not now see in his seat. As he is not here I will submit to the House a few thoughts, not upon the sectional and partisan aspects of this case, but upon the expediency of the course which we have been pursuing.

Since the cessation of hostilities and the restoration of the South to her political power on this floor, there has been a large amount of money expended from the National Treasury for the payment of "loyal claims." It has been recently discovered by some statesmen in the land that that is a bad policy, and it has been attributed to southern statesmen. It has been charged here and elsewhere that the country is in danger of being overwhelmed with war claims to be presented and passed through Congress by the votes of southern Representatives. How many rebel war claims have been passed through Congress by their votes? How many have been passed by the votes of any section?

Sir, no part of these claims have been paid to what is known as the confederate element in the southern portion of this country. I do not believe that one solitary dollar that has gone from the Federal Treasury has gone to reimburse any man whose heart beat in sympathy for that cause.

To whom has that money gone? It has gone to the exclusively "loyal" element in the South. Who is responsible for that legislation? I am sure her representatives can stand here and say to their accusers, "Thou canst not say I did it; shake not thy gory locks at me." Did not one of your most distinguished leaders in the North in 1876 boast to the people of Ohio that the party to which he belonged had poured out $100,000,000 of the public treasure to pay the loyal citizens of the South?

Loyalty at the South! Loyalty in that deadly struggle when every generous heart in that land, from the aged man tottering upon his staff to the child in its cradle, beat in sympathy for the success of her cause!

Whose were those spotless names in Sardis that walked in white through all the vigils of that night of temptation? Whose are the knees that did not bow at the altar of the idolator? Who are the brave patriots that clung to the floating planks of the Federal Union in that starless night of storm and shipwreck?

Where was loyalty found? Skulking behind her armies, in the bosoms of sutlers, speculators, contractors, and dead-beats, who had no devotion to either cause, but men in whose bosoms reigned supreme selfishness, upon the altar of whose hearts God had never kindled the fire of patriotism—bummers, speculators, and home-guards—men who had no country, and the only shrine at which they worshiped was the shrine of self. And in order to purchase that class as a political element the public Treasury was made to contribute, not under the leadership of southern democrats either, one hundred millions of dollars.

Since I have been a member of this House my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. TURNEY] offered a resolution, for which I cheerfully voted, to shut down upon all applicants for claims arising out of the war, coming from any section of the Union, whether loyal or disloyal. It received only one vote on the other side of the House, and only twenty-four votes in the entire House. Yet that is the only true course and the only true line of statesmanship for us to pursue now. The only proper course is for us to regard this war terminated at Appomattox as waving the wing of oblivion over all these claims.

What justice is there in taxing the poor, persecuted people of the United States either in the North or in the South, exhausted by the most destructive and wasteful war that history gives any account of, taxing them to reimburse some who have merely a legal technicality as a claim to be presented against the United States? Why should the widow and the orphan whose husband and father poured out his blood for his country—why should they be taxed in their cotton and their woolen goods; taxed in their sugar, taxed in the medicine which they administered to them as they lay on beds of languishing and pain to pay the class now growing so numerous, who were loyal to their own sordid selfishness; who skulked behind the Army and now propose to take an oath that they did not sympathize with the cause of the Confederate States?

Sir, this is not right; it is all wrong. And these claims will increase in amount as we get away from the close of the war, and the hearts of those who present them will increase in loyalty and the claims will rise mountain-high as you recede from the bloody scenes of 1861 and 1864.

And the only proper, wise course for us to pursue is to adopt a constitutional amendment and say the war is ended, and all claims are paid or extinguished.

There was something which had to be determined by that war. It was left as a legacy by our fathers who founded this Government. They did not dare to settle the question upon which the North and South went to arms. It was left an open question for them in the Constitution. It came down and was debated for three generations, and at last 2,500,000 of the bravest men that ever trod the earth settled it in discussion on the bloody fields of battle, and to-day, to attest that settlement, perhaps a million of them are sleeping in their unmarked and unknown graves, while howling above them like jackals come these sutlers and bummers calling for their claims and appealing to the national honor to discharge its honest obligations.

Have they any higher or holier claim upon the national gratitude than the army of widows and orphans all over the Union whose husbands and fathers have laid down their lives for their country's welfare? Who is to pay them for their claims? Claims that cannot be estimated in figures, much less paid. Who is to lend a listening ear to the appeals that come from the grief-stricken households of the South, where the bier of death has been stretched by every hearthstone? Who can reimburse their claims? The cause for which her braves have fought is lost, and with it all was lost. Do you now propose to send the tax-gatherer to those households of poverty and extort from the pittance left them an annual contribution as long as they live to repay these so called loyalists? I shall vote against every one of them. [Applause on the democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield the remaining portion of his time?

Mr. MILLS. I will yield to anybody who wants it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, it is with sincere reluctance that I rise to take part in this debate. As long as charges such as were made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] against the South were confined to the republican side of this House and to the Senate I felt inclined to allow them to pass unnoticed, because I believed their purpose was to make political capital by drawing us into heated and imprudent discussions. But when the reproach is taken up by one who professes to be a democrat, and who intimates that southern Representatives and their constituents are held in the line of democracy simply by the hope of plunder to be obtained under the plea of loyalty of a part of our citizens, I think it is time I should speak for myself and the section of country which I in part represent.

The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] whose reconversion to democracy was quite as sudden, if not as important and interesting, as that of St. Paul to Christianity, has thought proper to make this charge indirectly against the South. Now, sir, I aver upon this floor and before the country that such a declaration is one of the most unfounded and unjust slanders ever put upon any portion of the people of the United States. Let us look for a moment to the facts of the case.

During the war, Mr. Speaker, "loyalty," as it was termed, which meant adherence to the Federal as against the confederate government, was at such a discount in the South as to produce social ostracism, and the man who proclaimed it openly scarcely felt his life secure. He was considered as an enemy to the South and to his people. Such was the intensity of feeling against these sentiments that men only uttered them with bated breath.

After the war was over the people of the North, appreciating what they termed "loyalty" and resolved to show their appreciation of such acts and opinions, established courts before which the claims of this class of citizens were to be heard and determined, and invited "loyal" men to come and propound them for settlement. These courts were organized with Union men as judges, who were lynx-eyed in their researches and deemed able to detect any fraud or imposition intended by what were called "rebels." When the cases were decided adversely to claimants they had the right of appeal to the Congress itself to revise the decisions of those courts. These tribunals were not established by southern men, much less by "rebels," but by Union men, northern democrats as well as republicans. When parties litigant could not get their claims through the courts fast enough they came to Congress where their claims have been urged in large numbers and millions of dollars have been paid upon them. "Rebels" had no part nor lot in all this matter. And even now be it known that we only introduce bills for our constituents—not that we indorse them, not that we come to the footstool of power and beg you to give these people what may or may not be due to them, but we do it because they are our constituents and have a right to our services in this matter. It is for gentlemen of this House to determine the question whether the claims are proper or not.

The gentleman talks about pecuniary losses sustained by his section during the war. If you will take into account the four million of slaves which were liberated, for which we received no compensation, you will find they were worth about $200,000,000. Add to this our losses by the depreciation, destruction, and confiscation of other property and the amount is almost beyond computation. Besides this, every battle, with a few exceptions, was fought upon southern soil, followed by spoliation and ruin. Your losses were not such as ours. I state these facts in no spirit of complaint, but simply for the truth of history. We went into the war with our eyes open, determined to win at all hazards, risking all we had upon the result.

It is not to be denied, however, that while the war was in progress many citizens in the North amassed immense fortunes by the manufacture of arms, munitions of war, clothing, and other necessary army supplies, and that in many localities the ravages and hardships of the war were scarcely felt. Not so with us. Its disastrous effects were felt everywhere. As to the losses of men in the respective sections, I have but a word to say. While the North by hiring substitutes and giving bounties to enlisted men was incurring a large proportion of the debt we are now endeavoring to pay off, there was scarcely a household in all the South which was not draped in mourning for the loss of father, husband, brother, or son.

The fighting we did was at the cost of the best blood of the South, while you were enabled by reason of having control of the Treasury of the United States to give bounty money to foreigners who fought your battles. I reiterate the statement that I am not complaining; I am uttering no reproach; but only declaring what yourselves know to be true.

Read us out of the party! Let me state a few facts which perhaps you have forgotten. Out of the thirteen Presidents of the United States elected up to the war we gave you seven—Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Polk, and Taylor; you gave us six—the elder and younger Adams, Van Buren, Harrison, Pierce, and Buchanan.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. You took seven.

Mr. SINGLETON. The people elected them, and every part of the country accepted and honored them. I wish to say another thing to my friend from New York, not by way of taunt, but as a fact in history: while five southern Presidents were elected a second time, no northern President up to the war ever served more than four years.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. You could not stand a northern man more than four years; you always beat our men the second time.

Mr. SINGLETON. I cannot yield further for interruptions.

During this period power was in the hands of southern Presidents forty-eight years, in the hands of northern twenty-four years. Did not the country prosper the while, and why, then, should we be read out of the party? Out of one hundred and thirty-six Cabinet officers of the United States up to the war we gave you sixty-seven—only one less than given by the North, having double our representation in Congress. Of Secretaries of State we gave you thirteen out of twenty-three; of Attorneys-General, seventeen out of twenty-nine; of Secretaries of War, seventeen out of thirty-two. We have never had a President who seized upon that office against the will of the people. We have never had a Secretary who was charged and convicted of corruption or who ever sold the offices at his disposal.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. What of Floyd, and Jake Thompson of your own State?

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman feels the force of what I have said, and I do not blame him at all that he squirms under it. The charges against Floyd and Thompson were nothing more than republican slanders.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say another thing which may have been forgotten. Every battle which was fought by our troops up to the late war in defense of the national honor or to repel invasion was fought under a southern President and our armies commanded by southern officers. The war of 1812 was begun and finished under the administration of Mr. Madison, General Jackson having brought it to a successful close. In this contest the principle of the right of search and the doctrine of expatriation were settled. The war of 1846 was carried on under the administration of Polk, a democrat and southern man; Scott and Taylor being the commanders of the Army.

I state further that there is not a foot of territory that has ever been acquired, either by purchase or conquest, outside of Alaska, that was acquired under any other than a southern President, not excepting the State of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Now, sir, let the gentleman from Wisconsin consider these facts and say whether he thinks he has the right to read the South out of the party. Why, Mr. Speaker, if what I have heard of his political history be true, he is but a babe in democracy and needs to be fed upon the milk of the word until he shall have grown stronger, and even then he ought to tarry at Jericho till his beard is grown before he assumes to excommunicate the fathers in Israel and essays to be a leader in the party. [Laughter.]

It is said of the Greek poet Anacreon when he undertook on one occasion to change the notes of his harp, which had been accustomed only to songs of love, that he might celebrate deeds of arms and give out heroic strains, although his harp was strung anew for that purpose it refused to sound any but its accustomed notes of love. And so it may be with the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has been so in the habit of abusing southern democrats on account of "southern claims" and "raids upon the Treasury" that now his mouth refuses to speak anything but abuse of his southern party friends.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, we shall have no more of this. I am willing to shake hands with my brother, [Mr. BRAGG,] and with him bury the hatchet, that hereafter as democrats we shall be united. Unity in a party implies equality, and would that gentleman have us occupy a position inferior to his own? If so, I tell him it will not be done. Why, sir, out of the one hundred and fifty-seven members of our party on this floor the South has ninety-four, while the North has only sixty-three. If these southern gentlemen should take leave of the northern democrats, there is no telling what would be their fate; and yet you would read us out of the party! I trust southern Representatives are democrats from principle. We could long since, if we had adhered to party only for the loaves and fishes, have sold out to our friends on the other side of the House. [Laughter.] They are always ready for a trade. [Continued laughter.] You can learn that from the investigation which is now going on in the lower story of this building, where proof is being made that offices were sold to raise money for party purposes.

No, sir, we are not now, as we never have been, in market. Fully believing that this Government can only be administered safely upon the principles of the democratic party, we cast our fortunes in with it and shall share its fate be it good or bad. Talk no more to us of "the cohesive power of public plunder." It is not a plant of southern growth.

We are poor, it is true, but we are not ready to barter our honor, which has stood the test through all the past, for gold or the poor emoluments of office. We have nothing to ask of northern democrats but even-handed justice.

If the war is not ended, then raise troops and levy taxes to suppress the rebellion. Do not make war upon us in this House in an unmanly and covert way. If the war be over, then regard us as your equals and deal justly with us.

Are we in the Union or are we out of it? If we are in it, then behave toward us as friends and not as enemies. If out of it, then cease to intermeddle with our affairs and leave us to manage them as best we may. Let us have no more of these family quarrels, for nothing is more disgusting to the general public. Let us help each other in all that is right, and counsel each other in matters of party fealty. Otherwise we can be of little use to you or you to us.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is as long as the gentleman from Wisconsin continues to run on the republican ticket.

Mr. SINGLETON. Of that I have nothing more to say. It has not been my purpose to say anything harsh to my political friends nor to gentlemen on the other side of this House. I have attempted to vindicate our motives and show by reference to the history of the past that we are at least worthy of some degree of consideration and confidence. If I have succeeded in this my only purpose has been accomplished.

Mr. MARTIN. I call for the previous question.

Mr. AIKEN. I ask the gentleman to keep his promise to me and allow me a few moments.

Mr. MARTIN. I will do it in the hour allowed to me to close debate.

Mr. AIKEN. I am opposed to the bill, and I simply wish to assign my reason for that opposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] will have one hour in which to close the debate, and he can yield any portion of it to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. MARTIN. I shall have an hour in the next morning hour, and the gentleman shall have all the time he wants. I will give my friend the time he asks for, but now I ask the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended.

Mr. SAYLER. I object and demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. The Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] will occupy the chair for the remainder of the day.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order, the morning hour having expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States, and to make rules for its government and regulation.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to make a motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair has already stated, the regular order is the consideration of the Army reorganization bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio from the joint committee on the reorganization of the Army.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire also to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. CONGER. I can do it alone.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlemen from Michigan raises the question of consideration upon the special order and the question is, will the House now consider the special order?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. What is the special order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is House bill 5499, to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States and to make rules for its government and regulation.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to reserve all points of order upon that bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the House refuses to adopt this motion I will move to go into Committee of the Whole upon the Army bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to know how the Army bill has precedence?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order made by the House on the 12th of December.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, from the joint committee on the reform and organization of the Army of the United States, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5499) to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States and to make rules for its government and regulation, accompanied by a report in writing thereon; which said bill was read twice, and, with the said report, was ordered to be printed and made a special order for January 9, 1879, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. BUCKNER. On the 23d of April an order was made, not by a majority vote but by unanimous consent, to take up another bill. I desire to know if that bill has not priority now over this bill which the gentleman is trying to get up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not mistaken. This is the special order, and the Chair is compelled to rule that it comes up. Now, if the majority of the House desire to consider the bill to which the gentleman refers they can vote down this motion.

Mr. CONGER. I ask whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] proposes to bring up an appropriation bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do; and if this motion is voted down I will move to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. FORT. Is it in order now to move to lay the bill upon the table?

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has reserved all points of order on the bill.

Mr. BANNING. The bill is a substitute for House bill 866. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BURCHARD. I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair doubts whether the gentleman can do that while the gentleman from Ohio is occupying the floor, except to submit a conference report or to enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BURCHARD. Will not the Chair hear my motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not disposed to take the gentleman from Ohio from the floor. He is entitled to the floor under the recognition of the Chair, and the Chair must protect him in his rights.

Mr. BURCHARD. Will the Chair hear me on the point of order——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot allow a member to be taken from the floor for a motion.

Mr. BURCHARD. The Chair certainly does not mean that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman to state that he wanted to submit a motion.

Mr. BURCHARD. Does the Chair decide that I cannot make any motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not while a gentleman is occupying the floor.

Mr. BURCHARD. I will call the attention of the Chair to a rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman rises to the point of order that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] is out of order in occupying the floor, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. BURCHARD. The rule gives any member the right, after the expiration of the morning hour, to move to proceed to business upon the Speaker's table, and that motion will take a member from the floor. This is the rule, as will be found on page 172 of the Digest:

It is an unvariable practice, too, to permit a member, upon the expiration of the morning hour, to take the floor, even though another may be occupying it, to make the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

I now take the floor and submit that motion; and pending that motion I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would like to inquire of the Chair, what is the question before the House? Is it to take up the Army appropriation bill, or to take up the bill of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER?] Suppose I vote "ay" on the pending proposition, for what am I voting? [Laughter.] Am I voting to take up the bill of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] or the bill of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING?]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has distinctly stated that the question of consideration has been raised upon the special order, being the bill in charge of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.] Pending that, however, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] moves to proceed to business on the Speaker's table, and under the rule the Chair is required to recognize that motion. But after business on the Speaker's table shall have been disposed of, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.]

Mr. BURCHARD. And pending that motion——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman must submit the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. BURCHARD. And pending that motion I am entitled to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I doubt whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] has the right to make such a motion about a bill of which I have the charge.

Mr. BURCHARD. Any member has the right to make that motion; but if the gentleman from New York does not want to consider that bill now I will withdraw that motion.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] has charge of a bill for the reorganization of the Army. If that bill is to be considered and acted upon by this House at all it is desirable that it shall be considered in advance of the Army appropriation bill, because it will in some measure affect the provisions of that bill. I have consented not to antagonize the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.] It is in the discretion of the House whether it will proceed to consider the bill of the gentleman from Ohio or not. I now give notice that if the House does not decide to go on with that bill I will then move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. Then I withdraw the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question before the House is, will the House now proceed to consider the bill of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] has charge?

Mr. GARFIELD. And that motion is not debatable.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 77, noes 112.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. BANNING called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being but 12 in the affirmative.

So the House determined not to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the reorganization of the Army.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendment disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 5180) to abolish the volunteer navy of the United States, agreed to the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. ANTHONY, and Mr. MCPHERSON as conferees on the part of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 6145) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask that the first and formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, when two days ago I attempted to launch my little bark freighted with a public cargo I found that I was on a stormy sea, and so I put back into port. The storm has come and passed, and as usual is succeeded by a calm in which we can hope to get a patient hearing for the public business.

The bill for the support of the Army which we are now considering is based upon estimates of the Secretary of War to the amount of $29,084,500. The amount recommended by the bill under consideration is $26,747,300, which isless than the estimates by the sum of $2,337,200. It exceeds the amount appropriated by the corresponding bill of the last session by the sum of $969,112.82.

This excess arises from the fact that the bill as it passed the House at the last session made appropriations for the support of an army containing twenty thousand five hundred men. In the Senate the number was increased to twenty-five thousand. But the Senate did not change the money figures of the appropriation. There was no power in the committee of conference to change those figures; and the consequence was that the bill of last year did not appropriate a sufficient amount for the support of the Army.

I am glad to say, however, that owing to the great economy which has been shown in the various departments of the military service the deficiency, which would have been $1,260,000 if measured by the additional pay alone, has been reduced to $700,000; so that if the necessary sum had been appropriated last year for the support of an army of twenty-five thousand men the amount appropriated by this bill would be almost identical with the amount required for the support of the Army last year.

The saving which we have been able to make has been mainly in the item of subsistence—the rations—which were estimated last year at twenty-two cents and are estimated this year at twenty cents, owing to the great fall in the price of the necessaries of life. The consequence is that no material additional expenditure is authorized by the bill, and there is no considerable saving.

Here let me say to the House that I do not deem it possible to effect any further considerable saving in the cost of the maintenance of the Army as it is now organized. In my judgment every item is reduced to a minimum. If there be any serious abuses in the expenditures of the money appropriated I do not know where they are. If, therefore, saving is to be made hereafter, it must be by another process, the process of reorganization and reconstruction. This will be evident by a reference to the amounts appropriated since 1874. In that year the appropriations for the support of the Army were $31,796,008.81; in 1875 the amount appropriated was $27,788,500; in 1876, $27,933,830; making for the three years under what I may term, if gentlemen on the other side will allow me, republican rule, a total of $87,518,338.81. For the three years of democratic control of this House the appropriations for the Army were: in 1877, $25,987,167; in 1878, $25,612,500; and in 1879, $25,778,187.18; making a total of $77,377,844.18—a reduction of $10,140,494.63 in the three years since the democrats have been in power in this House, as compared with the three previous years.

But as I wish to do entire justice, I must say that the expenses of maintaining the Army had been in the natural course of things reduced by a fall in the cost of supplies. Moreover, from this apparent saving of $10,000,000, there is to be made an honest deduction of about $2,000,000 for deficiencies which have been created, and which, so far as not appropriated for, have not yet been made good. So that the sum total of saving which we can claim on the Army appropriation bills within the last three years may be said to be about $8,000,000. But it is right to observe that the deficiencies have been altogether due to the extra cost of the Indian wars, which had not been anticipated or estimated for when the appropriations were made. The saving, therefore, since the advent of the democrats to power in this House may therefore be set down as $8,000,000 to $10,000,000; a considerable sum, it is true, but small in comparison with the economy which might be effected by a proper reorganization of the Army.

LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

When I reported the Army appropriation bill last year, I undertook to show the House (and I think I succeeded in showing) that the Army could be reorganized so as not to impair its efficiency and still save annually about $4,000,000. According to the plan which I then submitted, about half that sum was saved by a reduction in the number of officers, for it is notorious that the Army is overloaded with officers; it is top-heavy. The other half was saved by reducing the number of men from 25,000 to 20,500 and by a reorganization of the regiments in such a manner as I believed would make this reduced number of men quite as effective as the number now in the Army—25,000. That proposition was adopted in the House, but was rejected in the Senate. The conference committee that had to pass upon this question was placed in one of the most embarrassing positions which could possibly occur in the legislation of the country. The rule of the House is that any general legislation may be incorporated in an appropriation bill, provided it effects a retrenchment of expenditures. The rule of the Senate is that no general legislation can be attached to appropriation bills. As a matter of course, the rule of the Senate could not by any possibility restrict or infringe upon the constitutional right of this House to send to that body a bill in any shape or form it may choose; but, on the other hand, it is quite as impossible for this House to constrain the action of the Senate. If that body should think the general legislation upon an appropriation bill to be inadmissible, we have then presented this alternative—the failure of the bill or the surrender on the part of this House of its claim to legislate upon appropriation bills.

My own judgment and conviction, the fruit of very considerable study before I had the honor to be a member of this House, and of very much observation since I have been here, lead me to the conclusion that as a rule general legislation upon appropriation bills ought to be avoided. But, Mr. Chairman, the question presents itself whether at any time and under any circumstances this House can be justified in insisting upon legislation in an appropriation bill even to the extent of allowing the bill to fail. That question is answered by a reference to the history of the birth and growth of British liberty. Redress of grievances prior to the passage of appropriation bills, prior to grants of supplies, has been the only instrument by which the British Commons have constructed and maintained the edifice of civil liberty. When the question of personal liberty—the right of the subject as it is called in England, the right of the citizen as we call it—comes in question, then by every lesson of tradition, by every conclusion of statesmanship, this House is not only justified in insisting upon a redress of grievances before agreeing to a supply bill, but to do anything else would be to abdicate its powers and to be treacherous to the memory of that long line of patriots who went before us in building up the fabric of human freedom which we inherited from our British forefathers, and which it is our duty to conserve and protect with the same fidelity as the English people to this hour display through their representatives in the halls of Parliament.

THE CONFLICT.

Now, Mr. Chairman, such an occasion arose in the Forty-fourth Congress. There were two conflicts in that Congress, one of which determined the result of the presidential election. This House agreed to a method of settlement of the gravest of all political questions which had ever arisen in this country, and it was loyal to its engagements. The second question arose on the Army appropriation bill, and it arose in this wise: it was the conviction of a large majority of the members of this House that the result of the presidential election was not in accordance with the choice of the people, but was governed, influenced, and controlled by the use of the Army in the States of Louisiana and South Carolina. There was then presented to the majority of this House one of those crucial tests which try the patriotism and statesmanship of Representatives. True to the lessons of the past, they attached to the Army appropriation bill a provision in the exercise of the unquestionable right of Congress directing where, when, and how the Army should be used in the States of South Carolina and Louisiana; that the Army should not be used to maintain certain State governments which had been created and only kept in existence by the exercise of the military power under the orders of the President. I mean by his "military power" his control over the military forces of the country which he exercised under certain statutes passed at the close of the war. The Senate refused to assent to that provision.

Three several conference committees, composed of different members, met and conferred upon the matter in difference. They failed to come to an agreement, and the result was the Forty-fourth Congress adjourned without passing any bill for the support of the Army. For one, I approved the steps taken by this House. I felt that to have done less would have been a base surrender of the right of a free people to control the Army and determine to what use it should be put. I repelled then, and I repel now, the idea that the President of the United States has any other control as Commander-in-Chief of the Army except that which is in accordance with the statutes which Congress may adopt. He is the organ through which the orders of the people, expressed by Congress, are to be given to the Army; and to surrender the power of regulating and controlling the use of the Army would be to convert this Government into a centralized despotism.

Moreover, I was glad the bill failed. It would have been a misfortune to this country if common ground had been found on that occasion by which this question should have been passed by for the moment and put out of sight. The loss of the bill aroused the attention of the people of this country to the old story of British liberty forgotten amid the din of arms and the conflict of war. It revived to a youthful generation who knew not the history of those men who from the time of James I to that of William III, consecrated their lives and their fortunes to the cause of human freedom, and with stern unbending energy never yielded to the frowns, or the caprices, or the approaches of power until they had surrounded the right of the subject with a bulwark which has never been successfully attacked in England, and which could never have been attacked successfully in this country but for the fact of the civil war. The failure of that bill brought us back to the old landmarks, raised the old question and brought the public judgment to a conclusion on that subject which can never again be shattered.

THE EXTRA SESSION.

An extra session was made necessary by the failure of the Army bill. For one, I came to this House, to the Forty-fifth Congress, with a determination not to allow any question public or private to interfere with the restoration and the recognition of the right of Congress to control the Army. To me it was the question of questions. I was placed, to my own surprise, in charge of the Army bill. The question at once presented itself, shall we renew the issue upon this bill which failed, or shall we reserve it to the bill to come for the next fiscal year? It seemed to me that to raise the question upon the bill to take the place of the one which failed would be a mistake. I did not want to see the democratic party arrayed, either by implication or direct action, against the Administration which had come into power over their heads and against their wishes. I felt, and was the first to say, that the Administration had a title which could not be successfully attacked; and it seemed to me it would be a mistake to reopen the issue as it must necessarily have been reopened on that bill. I thought it was a mistake even to attempt any reorganization or reduction, and the bill was brought into this House without any reduction. And I ask pardon of gentlemen if I make this explanation, because I have been severely criticised in some quarters for what I did on that occasion. It was brought into this House without the reduction of a man, without an attempt to cut off an officer, without any provision looking to the assertion of the right of the people to control the Army. This omission was done purposely and the bill passed, and then disappeared, I trust forever, the wreck which surrounded the late presidential campaign.

THE POSSE COMITATUS CLAUSE.

When the new bill came along, the bill under which the Army is being maintained for the present year, then it seemed to me the question thus passed over ought to be raised anew. And here I want to make my acknowledgments to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom I applied for help on that occasion, and who, with the skill of a Somers, drew the clause which is now known as the posse comitatus clause.

I did not think it wise to insert that clause in the bill as reported by the committee. I preferred that the committee should come in under the rules of the House with provisions which should reorganize and reduce the expense of maintaining the Army. I preferred that the fight should be made upon the question of economy, and you, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,] and other gentlemen here will bear witness that whatever power I had I exerted to the utmost to secure the economy which that bill would have produced; and it passed the House.

But I say now that I regarded the question of money involved in that bill and the question of reorganization which it presented as of utter insignificance compared with the provision which I had arranged with my friend from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] to offer in this House. It was offered; it was ruled in order; it was passed, and it went to the Senate where it and the entire reorganization scheme were rejected. Then came the conference committee, and an anxious conference it was. I had a perfect understanding with my colleague on that committee, I mean my democratic colleague, that while we would secure as much economy and reduction of expenditures as might be possible, yet we would surrender it all, every jot and tittle of the saving, if we could preserve the posse comitatus clause; and we also had a perfect understanding that, no matter what might be conceded in the way of reduction and economy, it would be no temptation for us to give up that provision upon which, as he and I believed, the future liberties of this country depended. I trust my colleague will pardon me if I say that this country and this House know not the debt of gratitude which they owe to him. During the hours, long and anxious, during which that provision was under discussion, he exhibited a patience, an acuteness, a breadth of comprehension, I was almost going to say an adroitness, which cannot be too highly commended; and if to any man we owe more than to another the securing of that great triumph, it is to my friend and colleague from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS.]

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

But, Mr. Chairman, we secured more than the posse comitatus clause, we secured a clause providing for the reorganization of the Army; that is to say, creating a commission whose business it was made to examine into the whole question and make report by bill or otherwise to this House, and pending such report and action thereon by the House all appointments and promotions were suspended.

That provision will secure a reorganization of the Army, whether in this Congress or in the next I know not and I frankly say I care but little. If gentlemen suppose that I take to myself any earthly credit for having studied the Army question and having tried to make myself familiar with a subject with which I had no previous acquaintance whatever, I beg them to dismiss any such idea. I have studied it with all the care that I know how to bring to it, and all the experience of a man of business; but I do not pretend to sufficient knowledge to deal with a subject of such vast difficulty. Nevertheless, I find by the study of the past that armies have never been successfully reorganized by soldiers. From the earliest days to the present time it has been the work of statesmen. Pericles and Ximenes, Louvois, Chatham, Hardenberg, Carnot—who, as Napoleon said, "organized victory"—and Wellesley and Castlereagh, and in our own country Calhoun and Stanton were the men who successfully organized armies. It is the work of statesmen and not of soldiers. For civilians to pretend to direct armies would be the height of folly; but questions of organization and administration are the very questions with which civilians who aspire to be called statesmen, or who are worthy of the name, are called upon and ought to deal; and army reorganization is one of the most conspicuous examples in which they have heretofore shown and will to the end of time show their capacity for successful administration.

REPEAL OF THE POSSE COMITATUS CLAUSE.

But, Mr. Chairman, our work is not done. The posse comitatus clause is objected to by the Secretary of War in his report. The Secretary of War is a lawyer of very great distinction; I had the honor to serve with him for two years in this House; he has no warmer admirer than I am and I would take his construction of a statute as readily as that of any man I have ever known. But in his report he has failed to grasp the magnitude of this question when he even suggests the idea of a repeal of the posse comitatus clause. Repeal never! I think that I am safe in saying that not a vote will ever be cast on this or the other side of the House for the repeal of that muniment of human liberty.

Mr. McCOOK. I would cast such a vote, for one.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My colleague from New York says he is ready to vote for its repeal. I hope the gentleman will live long enough to devote himself to the study of those underlying principles upon which the fabric of constitutional law has been built. The narrower construction of statutes I concede the gentleman has studied and in that he is possibly an expert, but when it comes to these questions which concern the very essence of free government, there is a work for him to do which he seems not yet to have undertaken.

Mr. McCOOK. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I would rather not be interrupted. I am quite willing if the gentleman desires to answer anything I have said that he should do so at the close of my remarks. I would not have made any reference to him but for the fact that he interrupted me.

Now, sir, I say repeal, never! Definition, yes. The provision may be too broad. It may impede the action, the proper action of the Government. There may be cases wherein the military power might be employed properly and usefully in the execution of civil process. It is not for me who am no lawyer to say what those cases are, but I can understand that on the frontier and in the Territories of the United States there may be occasions when in the absence of police it may be necessary to invoke the aid of the Army, and I do not know that even that is prohibited by the clause; but if there be any prohibition which interferes with the security of life, liberty, and property then let us define and correct it, and I trust it will be the work of the next Congress to define when and where and how the military power of the country may be invoked. My colleague says he will vote for it. I commend to him an extract from a letter of one who is a great lawyer and who happens to be the chief cabinet officer of this country at this time; possibly his authority might go a little way with the gentleman. Mr. Evarts, then Attorney-General of the United States, in a letter addressed to a United States marshal used the language which I now ask the Clerk to read. Remember this was prior to the passage of the posse comitatus clause.

The CLERK. After quoting the act of '89 and the familiar opinion of Mr. Cushing in relation to the fugitive-slave act, Mr. Evarts says, addressing a United States marshal:

While, however, the law gives you this power to command all necessary assistance and the military within your district are not exempt from obligation to obey, * * * the special duty and authority in the execution of process issued to you must not be confounded with the duty and authority of suppressing disorder and preserving the peace which under our Government belongs to the civil authorities of the United States. Nor is this special duty of the marshal in executing process issued to him to be confounded with the authority and duty of the President of the United States in the specific cases of the Constitution under the regulations of the statutes to protect the States against domestic violence, or with his authority and duty under special statutes to employ military force in subduing combinations in resistance to the laws of the United States; for neither of these duties or authorities is shared by the subordinate officers except when and as the same may be specifically communicated to them by the President. * * * Nothing can be less in accordance with the nature of our Government or the disposition of our people than a frequent or a ready resort to military aid in execution of the duties confided to civil officers.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE AT THE POLLS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. That is sound law and it is statesmanship. Now, this work which we have undertaken is not yet completed. I ask the Clerk to read section 2002 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. "Or to keep the peace at the polls." This statute was enacted in 1865 after the close of the war. It was enacted as a protection of the citizen in his right of voting against military interference that "no military or naval officer or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held." The object was to prohibit the presence of troops at the polls, and then as if in irony which is almost sublime the words follow, "except it may be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls." I do not know who wrote that statute, but under favorable conditions he would have developed into a satirist of the highest order.

"To keep peace at the polls!" How easy is it to have a little disturbance at the polls. It can be got up to order, and generally without order, and then the military officer may march up his troops to preserve the peace, but where meanwhile is the voice of the people? Inter arma silent leges.

On the day of election the people are sovereign. That is the day when the soldier should not be seen. Moreover, it forms no part of the duty of the General Government to "keep the peace at the polls." That is the duty of the States; that is a part of the sovereign power which they kept to themselves.

Prior to 1865 no one ever suggested that the Federal Government could enter within the confines of a State and "keep peace at the polls." In saying this I do not mean to reflect upon my republican friends.

The close of the war, when this statute was passed, was a martial era. Men still breathed a military atmosphere; passion still reigned supreme, passion upon both sides. The judgment of men was paralyzed. They were in no condition to frame just and wise legislation. But how it happens that this clause has thus far been allowed to remain upon the statute-book passes my comprehension, and I appeal to gentlemen upon the other side of the House with the same confidence that I do to those upon this side, to help us to expunge it from the statute-book as a blot on the charter of American freedom.

THE BRITISH PRACTICE.

If the gentlemen want to know how monarchical governments protect the liberties of its subjects let them listen to the wise and solemn words of the British statute.

This statute which I will have read was enacted in the reign of Queen Victoria. It was the re-enactment of a statute passed during the reign of George II, and if I may be permitted to refer my colleague [Mr. McCOOK] to Blackstone, he will find some suggestive commentaries on the subject of this statute, which had been enacted just before their publication.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it enacted, That on every day appointed for the nomination or for the election or for taking the poll for the election of a member or members to serve in the Commons House of Parliament no soldier within two miles of any city, borough, town, or place where such nomination or election shall be declared or poll taken shall be allowed to go out of the barrack or quarters in which he is stationed, unless for the purpose of mounting or relieving guard, or for giving his vote at such election; and that every soldier allowed to go out for any such purpose within the limits aforesaid shall return to his barrack or quarters with all convenient speed as soon as his guard shall have been relieved or vote tendered.

SEC. 3. And be it enacted, That when and so often as any election of any member or members to serve in the Commons House of Parliament shall be appointed to be made, the clerk of the Crown in chancery or other officer making out any new writ for such elections shall, with all convenient speed, after making out the same writ, give notice thereof to the secretary at war, or, in case there shall be no secretary at war, to the person officiating in his stead, who shall, at some convenient time before the day appointed for such election, give notice thereof in writing to the general officer commanding in each district of Great Britain, who shall thereupon give the necessary orders for enforcing the execution of this act in all places under his command.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It will there be seen that whenever an election for members of Parliament takes place the soldier must disappear from the scene. The people are sovereign on that day; and if a riot should break out upon that day the military force could not be used for its suppression. During the hours of election the soldier must be within his barracks. That there may be no mistake about this the clerk of the Crown is charged with the duty of making known through the war office that an election is to take place, in order that the symbol of force may retire and the majesty of the people may reign supreme, at least for one day, when the right of suffrage is exercised in the island of Great Britain.

Let me here recall the noble preamble of the mutiny act under which the standing army is maintained in Great Britain:

Whereas the raising or keeping a standing army within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of Parliament, is against law;

* * * * * * * *

And whereas no man can be forejudged of life or limb, or subjected in time of peace to any kind of punishment within this realm by martial law, or in any other manner than by judgment of his peers, and according to the known and established laws of this realm.

Oh, what a proclamation of the rights of the subject is that! No king, no potentate, no power but the law of the land can coerce the subject in time of peace.

In the forty-first section of that bill is another provision, which until it came under my eye the other day had escaped notice:

No person who shall be commissioned and in full pay as an officer shall be capable of being nominated or elected to be sheriff of any county, borough, or other place, or to be mayor, portreeve, alderman, or to hold any office in any municipal corporation in any city, borough, or place in Great Britain or Ireland.

FREE ELECTIONS.

So jealous are they of the military power that they will not allow a military officer to hold a civil commission. They are not in England willing to have the power of the army confounded even for a day with the machinery by which civil process in enforced. Yet we, in this country, have solemnly enacted that on an election day, "if it is necessary to keep the peace," the Army of the United States may be marched to the polls. Such a provision is at war with every principle for which our ancestors contended, and which is embodied in the frame-work of our Government. Every hour that we allow it to remain on the statute-book is treason to the great men who achieved liberty for us, who founded this Government of ours after fighting for the right of representation, who imbedded this right into the Constitution, who jealously guarded it from the foundation of the Government until 1860, and whose spirits, if they could speak to us in this Hall, would entreat us to remember the sacrifices by which this liberty was secured, and not allow it to be imperiled by the insidious use of the military power. But all this has been better said by Mr. David Dudley Field, in an article of his, published in the Albany Law Journal, in September, 1877, upon this very subject. It was written after a very full conference in which I enjoyed the benefit of his instructions and advice. He sums up the whole matter in language which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The great maxims of free governments are the fruit, not of one generation or of one century, but of many generations and many centuries; they have been fought for and suffered for; they have been established and consecrated by blood and fire. If we would preserve them and profit by them, we must remember them, teach them, and stand by them. It is an accepted article of the political creed of every free country that the military is and must be subject to the civil power. Whoever teaches that any military officer, from the highest to the lowest, from the commander-in-chief to the sergeant of a guard, can lawfully command his soldiers to enter any place or do any act which the law-making power of his country forbids, should be accounted, as he is in fact, the enemy at once of his country and his race.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Now, I count upon the cordial support of both sides of this House in the attempt to amend the statute which I have just read, by striking out the words "or to keep the peace at the polls." At the proper time I shall offer an amendment for that purpose. This provision is not now in the bill as reported to the House, because I think it better that there should be a direct vote of the House taken as to whether it shall come in or not.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman proposes to move that as an amendment to the Army appropriation bill?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes, of course, subject to a point of order, which I trust no gentleman will make. I count, indeed, upon the unanimous support of both sides of the House of such an amendment. I know that on this side of the House we do not monopolize either the statesmanship or the patriotism of this country. I accord to gentlemen on the other side the fullest credit for a desire to preserve whatever we have gained in the direction of freedom, and to add to it by every possible means.

When this statute was passed it may possibly have been supposed that it was a provision for the protection of the constitutional rights of the citizen. But after even the very imperfect discussion I have given it I think it must be apparent to this House that so far from its being a protection it is a step backward which we ought to retrace at the earliest possible moment.

ARMY ORGANIZATION.

Having devoted much time to the study of army organization, and having enjoyed the benefit of the advice and assistance of one of the most competent of living military critics in this or any other country, I deem it best to include in these remarks what I was prepared to make in case my friend from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] had succeeded in getting the bill reported by the commission before the House. I trust that it may have some value when this important matter shall come up for final disposition.

Army organization, in the modern sense of the term, is the work of Louvois, the great war minister of Louis XIV. His "Royal Regulations" for the government of troops in field or in camp, for the distribution of authority and responsibility, for frequent inspection of troops, stores, and magazines, are used to-day by civilized governments. At the time and after, noblemen and gentlemen of wealth and influence raised regiments and maintained a proprietary interest in them. As proprietors they received money from government for pay, rations, and clothing, but the money more frequently provided for their debaucheries than for the necessities of their men. Without fear or favor of persons Louvois stopped these malpractices, and his inspector-general, the celebrated Colonel Martinet, whose name has become a synonym of strict discipline, arrested some of the greatest nobles of France. In the memoirs of Saint-Simon can be found an amusing description of the wild indignation of these worthies when Colonel Martinet overhauled their accounts.

The beginning and close of the eighteenth century produced the two great strategists of modern times, Marlborough and Napoleon; but armament and tactics experienced but little change until the last five-and-twenty years. Nothing was learned from the experience gained by our colonists in their combats with savage foes. Braddock and subsequent British commanders regarded the practice of fighting under cover as evidence of a cowardly spirit and scorned the colonial riflemen. Even after the Tyrolese marksmen, abandoned by Austria, had driven the French and Bavarians from their country, Napoleon seems to have attached no importance to their mode of fighting. Prior to the Crimean war the destructive force of armaments and consequent value of the different arms of military service may be stated as follows:

The effective range of the smooth-bore musket—the "Brown Bess," of Marlborough and Wellington—was sixty yards; extreme range, a hundred yards. In action no attempt at aim was made, and, indeed, would have been useless. To fire in the direction of the enemy was all that could be expected. The effective range of artillery, using grape or canister, was but three or four times greater than that of the musket, and at extreme range, solid shot was destructive by chance, even when directed against large masses. Shell firing from field or siege pieces is of recent date, mortars being exclusively used for that purpose. The heavy losses suffered in such actions as Oudenarde, Malplaquet, Borodino, and others were not due to the efficiency of the weapons employed, but rather to their inefficiency. Fighting was almost hand to hand, and when one party gave way the victors were upon them to slaughter at will. Under such conditions cavalry was of great importance. In a rapid charge upon infantry, but one, or at the most two, volleys had to be sustained, and none but the steadiest infantry could withstand the shock of saber or lance, even when formed in squares. The great range, precision, and rapidity of fire of the repeating breech-loader have changed this, and a few score of infantry, under cover of hedge or wall, would laugh at a battalion of cavalry. On neither side during our civil war was cavalry effective, except when dismounted and fighting on foot. In the Sadowa campaign, the superb Austrian cavalry, considered the best in Europe, accomplished nothing against the needle-gun. At Gravelotte a large part of the cavalry of the Prussian guard was sacrificed to stay a threatened forward movement of the French until infantry could come up. Had mounted infantry been employed, the same mobility would have been preserved and the object accomplished at much less expenditure of men. At Sedan, a French regiment attempted to charge a line of German infantry, but men and horses were annihilated before half the intervening space was passed. A glamour surrounds the jingling spur and clanking saber, but on a battle-field the cavalryman is as useless as would be a mailed knight. Mounted infantry, with the mobility of one arm and the fighting capacity of the other, is alone in harmony with existing armaments.

Napoleon largely employed the moral force of artillery, massing guns to thunder against some part of the enemy's position before launching his columns of attack. Veterans take small heed of the "vox et præterea nihil" of artillery. It is only when the whir of the bullet mingles with the thud of shot and shell that they feel the sense of battle. During the sepoy mutiny bodies of mutineers would hold together so long as they retained guns which the fear of losing prevented them from bringing into action. The British columns in pursuit directed their efforts to the capture of these guns, whereupon the sepoys dispersed. Some of this superstition yet lingers from times when guns were scarce and costly and their possession highly prized. To lose guns was disgraceful, and the point of honor with an artilleryman was to save his pieces under all circumstances. This had the effect of making commanders of batteries nervous at critical moments. Sound doctrine would teach that guns must be fought to the last moment, and are creditably lost when they have delayed and punished the enemy. At Buena Vista, Bragg with his battery was ordered to close the gap through which a heavy force of Mexicans was advancing. "I see no supports, general, and without them may lose my guns." "You must rely on me and my staff for support," replied the general, "there is none other. If the enemy pass this point, not only your guns but everything will be lost." Bragg unlimbered and went into action, with the enemy right upon him. The result is history; and this is the prose of the legend: "A little more grape, Captain Bragg."

Commanders of armies or corps on both sides in our civil war will admit that they were frequently burdened with too much artillery, which cut up and obstructed roads, required multitudes of wagons to transport ammunition, demanded troops of other arms for protection, and involved much forethought to keep it out of danger. The existing breech-loader has a range of from fifteen hundred to two thousand yards, and at these distances, securely under cover, a few marksmen can destroy a battery.

Horse, commonly called flying, artillery is alone effective in the field. It possesses great mobility, even over the most broken ground, and can go into or out of action with such rapidity as to make it independent of supports; but men and horses require long and constant drill, which governments must secure in time of peace. Captain Ramsay, of the British army, was the pioneer of horse artillery. The rapid movements of his battery on the field and its distinguished service appear in Wellington's dispatches and in Napier's Peninsular War.

Short range and small destructive power of arms determined infantry formation and tactics. Lines were of three, even four ranks, and the momentum of heavy columns was relied on to carry positions. Notwithstanding the feebleness of small-arms, the superiority of line over column in giving fire-front was asserted where infantry possessed unusual steadiness—a characteristic of the British.

At Albuera the "Buffs"—a British regiment—advanced in line on a heavy column of French veterans. By close and steady volleys the British swept away the French and prevented them from deploying, though animated by the presence of Soult. It was a noble feat of arms, and afforded a theme for the pen of Napier to write the grandest military description in any language. Had the experience of Waterloo occurred earlier in his career, Napoleon would have modified his tactics of attacking in column. As our civil war progressed, pluck and armament being alike, though numbers were unequal, the fighting-place was the skirmish line; or the party acting beyond it suffered immense losses of men. Witness Grant's campaign in the Wilderness and Hood's at Franklin.

In their late war with France the Germans substantially followed our example, while the Russians, neglecting it and attacking in mass at Plevna, were mowed like grass by the Turks, squatting securely behind earthworks.

The skirmish-line is now the fighting line, and the company the fighting unit, which establishes the line, feeds it as occasion demands, and depends for support on the battalion.

With the battalion—the command of a major—as the unit of administration, the company and battery as fighting units, there is great waste in preserving antiquated regimental organizations with colonels and lieutenant-colonels, and in the line of the Army these latter grades can be dispensed with. Small companies are expensive and inefficient. Subtract sick, details for fatigue, and guard duties, and nothing remains for active service or company drills. Officers and men necessarily become apathetic. Pay of non-commissioned officers should be increased, and other means adopted to elevate their tone; and from them should be taken a fair proportion of commissioned officers. Germany has derived great advantage from this system, and other powers are following her example.

The foregoing statements and conclusions hardly admit of dispute, and may readily be applied to the organization of five-and-twenty thousand men, the present strength of our military establishment.

One major-general and six brigadier-generals would be adequate. The officer in command of the Army should have superiority of grade; for this, rather than seniority in the same grade, insures prompt obedience.

Stationed permanently at the seat of government and in contact with the civil power the staff of all armies tends to exalt itself at the expense of the line. It also subserves the vanity of executive power to surround itself with a numerous and gorgeous staff. In our service the staff has become like a swollen pasty, in whose depths the line is hardly visible; and it requires pruning both in rank and numbers. True, the staff is the brain of an army, but over-development of brain produces hydrocephalus, followed by atrophy of body and limbs. The grade of general—the yellow sash—should be the reward of military success and merit, and heads of staff departments limited to that of colonels; but as their duties force them to reside at the seat of government they should have higher pay than line officers of like grades who occupy public quarters and are enabled to live less expensively. An organization of staff departments fully adequate to the needs of our service would be as follows:

An adjutant and inspector-general's department, with one colonel and the necessary number of lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, and lieutenants. The "Bureau of Military Justice" should be discontinued, and its duties discharged by the adjutant and inspector department, to which they belong.

A medical department, with one chief surgeon of the rank of colonel, surgeons of the rank of major, and assistant surgeons of the rank of captain and lieutenant.

A department of ordnance and artillery, with a chief of the rank of colonel, and such majors, captains, and lieutenants as are necessary, detailed from the corps of artillery for limited periods.

As the ordnance officers are the manufacturers for the Army at least one armory for the construction of small-arms should be maintained and operated by the Government, not merely as a school of instruction for artificers and inspectors and for the improvement of construction, but as a check upon private manufacturers in time of war or whenever a sudden demand for fire-arms might arise. So, also, arsenals for the construction of munitions of war are necessary and should be permanently maintained upon a limited scale.

In regard to uniting the Quartermaster's with the Commissary department there appears to be a wide difference of opinion. Mr. Calhoun favored the separation, while the modern French and German system unites them into one department of supply. Whether they be united or kept separate the organization should consist of a colonel, lieutenant-colonels, and majors adequate for the permanent direction of the business, while the lower grades of captain and lieutenant should be filled by details from the line, but the officers so detailed should be returned to line duty after service on the staff for four years, and all promotions to the grade of major in these departments should be made from line officers who had thus served.

The Pay department should in like manner be reorganized with a colonel at its head, with a lieutenant-colonel and a suitable number of majors, not exceeding forty, with a provision for details similar to that suggested for the department of supply.

One fails to understand the propriety of attaching the Signal bureau to the Army. Its duties specially concern commerce and agriculture and belong to the civil department of the Government. Officers of the staff could readily learn whatever is applicable to war in short assignments to signal duty; but it is well for the people to know the cost of their military establishment pure and simple.

The Corps of Engineers is of such importance to the civil as well as to the military interests of the country as to entitle it to great consideration. The knowledge and training required are of a special character, and cannot be improvised to meet emergencies. A chief engineer with rank of colonel, a liberal number of lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, and lieutenants, and a small battalion of engineer troops should be maintained; but graduates from West Point, assigned to the engineers, should serve for a year with each of the three arms, cavalry, artillery, and infantry, before permanently joining the corps. This would make them better soldiers and none the worse engineers.

The corps of artillery should be organized with reference to the light or horse battery, which requires one captain, two first and one second lieutenants, and a hundred and twenty-five enlisted men. Two horse batteries should constitute a battalion under a major. In view of the importance of this arm and the instruction necessary to render it efficient, eight batteries or four battalions should be kept up. The remaining companies—say sixteen—of the corps should garrison seacoast fortifications and arsenals, repair arms, prepare fixed ammunition, and receive instruction in torpedo service. By transfers the duties appropriate to the corps can be learned by all, and the assistants needed by the chief of ordnance and artillery at headquarters should be detailed for limited periods from the officers of the corps.

Companies of cavalry and infantry should consist of a captain, one first and one second lieutenant and one hundred enlisted men; and four companies, under a major, should constitute a battalion.

The term cavalry is used for convenience, but the remarks concerning mounted infantry are to be remembered, and equipment and instruction conform thereto.

Subordinating the number of battalions and the relative strength of the different arms to the whole military force, as established by law, minor details can be readily worked out, but these facts must be borne in mind: the President is the constitutional Commander-in-Chief of the Army, which he governs through the Secretary of War, who is a civil officer with civil duties. He is no more a part of the Army than the engineer is part of the machine which he controls by letting on or shutting off steam.

Army regulations should be elastic, and are of necessity matters of administration, to be changed in conformity with circumstances. To convert regulations into statutes, which would require the submission of every trivial modification to Congress, would be absurd. As well put the Army into an iron cage.

To acquaint officers and men with field evolutions and the value and proper use of the different arms, camps of instruction are necessary; and one, comprising a battalion each of cavalry, horse-artillery, and infantry, with a detachment of engineers, should be established under the command of a general officer. The entire Army should in turn be thus instructed. Further, and of more importance than any other employment of the Army in time of peace, it should be made the duty of the Secretary of War to confer with the executives of the several States with the view to unite this camp of instruction with bodies of State troops for autumnal maneuvers.

These camps of instruction should be held successively in the several States, and the Federal Government should give every possible encouragement to the establishment of rifle ranges and the general diffusion of military knowledge. The supply of arms, uniforms, and even the giving of prizes, would, it seems to me, not be beyond the power confided by the Constitution to the Federal Government to secure the establishment of a national militia. If, in addition to all this, military drill were introduced, as it should be, into every common school in the land, the country will be spared the humiliating spectacle of governors of great Commonweaths calling as on ague-smitten Cæsar for help to suppress riots.

As Thiers said of a constitutional monarch, the Federal Government should reign, not govern. From his own State the weight of authority should be felt by the citizen. He can grumble, vote against the administration, or, at worst, move to another; but oppressed by Federal power, he is as helpless as would have been a Roman subject against the master of the world.

From abuse of local government comes anarchy as from that of centralization, despotism; and in proportion to their fear of one or hatred of the other, so men divide. These are the systole and diastole of our politics.

In a discussion with John Horne Tooke, Lord Grey observed that he preferred despotism to anarchy. "This is of a piece with the conduct of your ancestors at the Reformation," said Tooke, "for they rejected purgatory and kept hell." Whatever the religious convictions of our race, the majority differ in opinion with Lord Grey.

While the number and organization of our military establishment may be subjects for discussion, there should be but one opinion of the necessity of subordinating, at all times, the military to the civil authorities.

With uncovered head the general should stand respectfully in the presence of the humblest magistrate; for the magistrate represents the supremacy of law and sits on a pyramid built of all the aspirations, struggles, and achievements of the race since Magna Charta. As in the days of Tiglath Pileser, the soldier is but the representative of brute force; and many modern instances prove that he can display Assyrian ferocity.

Now, Mr. Chairman, unless some gentleman desires to occupy further time I shall move that the committee rise to close general debate, that we may then proceed to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt that by unanimous consent general debate may be closed, and that we may go on under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE,] who expected to speak on the Army reorganization bill if it should come up, desires ten minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. About that time.

Mr. BANNING. I desire to occupy some little time.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then I shall not move at present to close general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] desire?

Mr. BANNING. I think about twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Chairman, I propose, when we shall have reached that part of the Army appropriation bill which provides for reduction and reorganization of the Army, to move as an amendment to the bill the substitute reported by me to the House from the joint commission on the reorganization of the Army.

I desired to have this substitute considered in the House before the Army appropriation bill was taken up. Having failed in that, I will endeavor to secure this legislation on the Army appropriation bill, although I should have preferred to have had it separately discussed.

In the last four years this House has passed two bills reducing and reorganizing the Army not less radical than the proposed measure. Both have failed in the Senate, and all the Army reorganizations and reforms accomplished have been upon appropriation bills.

In June last, an act was passed authorizing the appointment of a commission to reform and reorganize the Army. All of the men appointed upon that commission had been soldiers either in the Union or confederate army in the war of the rebellion. All but one had been volunteer officers. The chairman of the commission, the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, a graduate of West Point, served for many years in the regular Army, and, at one time, as is well known to all, commanded the army of the Potomac in the war of the rebellion.

The necessity for Army reorganization is so apparent and has been so often discussed and shown on this floor, that I will not stop to repeat it now; a regimental organization of a colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and major, with full commissioned and non-commissioned staff, in charge of the headquarters and in command of the regimental band; old captains and lieutenants reporting for duty in command of one non-commissioned officer and no private soldiers; companies that do not contain a corporal's guard—so farcical, ridiculous, and expensive withal as to cause commanding officers to recommend consolidation or an increase of the enlisted men of the Army; while our large and expensive staff, that feeds, clothes, and transports our little Army, has grown to such huge proportions, that it takes more money to pay them and the commissioned officers of the line than it takes to pay the entire army of enlisted men, non-commissioned officers, and private soldiers!

Reviewing this subject in 1869, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in a report to this House, said:

> The staff departments or corps are, in the opinion of the committee, too numerous and too large in proportion to the line of the Army.
> There has been for a long time a tendency toward the multiplication of departments, increase of rank, and independence of control in the staff that ought to be checked.

At the time this report was made the line of the Army numbered thirty-four thousand enlisted men, since which it has been reduced to less than twenty-five thousand, while the staff, in place of being reduced accordingly, has been increased.

We have in our Army commissioned officers enough to command one hundred thousand men, staff enough to supply them, and regiments enough to contain them, if organized in accordance with modern military principles.

An old officer in his testimony before the committee says:

> It is rather stupid work for an officer to go out and drill four men. After having been a captain for ten years, I have frequently gone out with four men.

General Sheridan says:

> If you increase the size of the companies you diminish the expense. One great item of expense at present arises from the fact that the companies are so small as to be non-effective. In order to get an effective body of men for any purpose it is necessary to take three or four companies from different places. That kind of management, of course, is expensive, and that is what we are obliged to resort to at present.

The Adjutant-General in his report for 1877 said:

> From a very early day the military history of this country contains records of disasters due solely to the "skeleton" organization of companies. Dade's massacre may be cited for the sake of a commencement as to dates, and Gibbon's late affair with the Nez Percés as the most recent. Gibbon had 6 companies in all, numbering 15 officers and 146 men. His companies averaged about 24 men each. With this handful of men he inflicted severe loss on an enemy treble his numbers. If his companies had averaged 80 men, he would have outnumbered Joseph's band, and would probably have captured or exterminated it.

And again, in the same report:

> There are already regimental and company organizations quite enough for an army of 50,000 enlisted men.

For the information of those who desire to understand the condition of our skeleton Army, I give the following, taken from the statement of the muster-rolls furnished the committee last session by the Adjutant-General:

> The strongest regiment of the cavalry was the Tenth, which had 44 commissioned officers and 925 enlisted men, of whom there were present for duty 17 officers and 598 men.
> The weakest regiment of cavalry was the Ninth, which had 43 commissioned officers and 453 enlisted men, of whom there were present for duty 16 officers and 275 men.
>
> The strongest regiment of artillery was the Third, with 57 commissioned officers and 462 enlisted men, of whom there were present for duty 29 officers and 335 men.
>
> The weakest regiment of artillery was the Fifth, with 57 commissioned officers and 433 enlisted men, of whom there were present for duty 24 officers and 306 men.
>
> The strongest regiment of infantry was the Tenth, which had 35 commissioned officers and 463 enlisted men, of whom there were present for duty 18 officers and 251 men.
>
> The weakest regiment of infantry was the Twenty-first, which had 36 commissioned officers and 309 enlisted men, of whom there were present for duty 17 officers and 201 men.
> A close examination of these muster-rolls discovers some curious facts. I will give a few of them: the largest company in the strongest infantry regiment only numbered 49 enlisted men—non-commissioned officers and privates—present and absent.
>
> While in this, the strongest infantry regiment, Company E was able to muster 38 enlisted men for duty, Company K of the same regiment could only muster 19 men for duty, Company H only 23 men, Company I only 22, and Company G only 15. Of the 269 officers and enlisted men present for duty in this regiment only 175 were privates. In Company G of this regiment there were 1 captain and 6 non-commissioned officers to command the 9 privates present for duty.
>
> In the Twenty-first Infantry we find present for duty as follows: Company A, 8 commissioned and non-commissioned officers, commanding 10 privates and 2 musicians.
>
> Company E, 10 commissioned and non-commissioned officers, commanding 11 privates and 2 musicians.
> Company F, 8 commissioned and non-commissioned officers, commanding 12 privates and 1 musician.
> In Company K the 8 privates and 1 musician were drilled, disciplined, and commanded by 10 commissioned and non-commissioned officers.
>
> These are specimens of the bad effects of dividing up our little Army into 40 regiments and 420 companies. Nor are they by any means the worst. For instance, at the same muster, in the "present for duty" in the Seventh Regiment of Infantry, we find the following:
>
> Company A, 5 commissioned and non-commissioned officers to command 4 privates and 1 musician.
>
> In Company K, 8 commissioned and non-commissioned officers to command 4 privates and 1 bugler—2 officers for each private.
>
> In Company E there were present for duty 1 captain, 2 sergeants, 2 musicians—5 in all—but not a single private.
> Company G was less fortunate in the matter of officers, for while it had 1 sergeant, 2 corporals, 1 bugler, 1 musician, and 6 privates, a total of 11 present for duty, it was without any commissioned officers whatever.

Our military organization is not only (as shown by our best military critics) a weak and ridiculous one, but according to its size the most expensive one upon the face of the earth. It is with a view to correct these evils and make our Army, what General Hancock says it should be, "a small, complete, compact, vigorous, healthy body," that the commission framed and presented the bill now offered as an amendment to the Army appropriation bill.

It is manifest that it would be impossible at this stage of the session for the House to give the time required for the proper consideration of the bill originally reported by the commission. We have therefore submitted the substitute now under consideration, which is that portion of the original bill which relates to organization solely, but divested of certain features which excited hostile criticism. This has been done in the hope and expectation of meeting the great and immediate necessity for reorganization to which I have more than once directed the attention of the House.

As I have said, the substitute deals only with reorganization, and I do not hesitate to assure the House that its adoption by Congress will result in greater efficiency in the service and an ultimate reduction of expenditures.

Let me briefly review the provisions of the bill.

By section 2 the various component parts of the Army are clearly and distinctly classified—a provision, the necessity for which will be at once admitted by every one familiar with the subject.

Section 3 fixes the number of major-generals at two and brigadier-generals at four. A reduction of one major-general and two brigadier-generals, to be made by casualties. The provision respecting the grades of general and lieutenant-general is the same as in existing law.

Section 4 reduces the number of aids to the General from six to three.

Section 5 reduces the number of aids to the Lieutenant-General from three to two.

Section 6 reduces the number of aids to major-generals and brigadier-generals from three to two and from two to one, respectively.

Section 8 defines the general staff and fixes the number of officers in that branch, and, in connection with the eighth clause of the fortieth section of the bill, consolidates the present Adjutant-General's and Inspector-General's departments, resulting in an aggregate reduction of three colonels and three majors.

This consolidation is one of the most important and most needed measures of Army reform, and was urged upon the House ten years ago by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Fortieth Congress.

The provision in this section for the detail of officers of the line to the performance of duties in the general staff is the same as is contained in subsequent sections relating to several of the staff departments. The permanent grades below major in the general staff, the Quartermaster's, Subsistence, and Ordnance departments are abolished, and those grades are to be filled by the detail, for a period of three years, of captains and first lieutenants who shall have served not less than six years in their respective corps. Vacancies in the grade of major in these departments and in the Pay department (to which the same principle is applied) are to be filled by the promotion of officers who have been so detailed and shown the greatest proficiency. This constitutes what is known as the interchangeability of the staff, and is designed to diffuse a practical knowledge of staff duties throughout the line of the Army, and to provide a staff composed of officers familiar with the requirements and necessities of the line and in sympathy with the body of the Army.

This is one of the most important reforms proposed by the bill, and if carried into effect will, in my judgment, prove of the greatest benefit to the staff itself as well as to the line of the Army.

The defects in the present system are obvious. In many instances a young and inexperienced officer, having the necessary political influence, is placed in the staff. He never returns to the line, and, spending his life in one department of the staff, he becomes in time what General Hancock has described "a mere clerk of a high order."

This reform is, of course, warmly opposed by the fortunate gentlemen now filling what the General of the Army calls "the soft places." These gentlemen have many friends upon this floor; they are courteous, attentive, and generous hosts, as many of you can testify; no doubt they have warned you of the dire consequences that will follow the adoption of this measure. Against their representations, (whatever they may have been,) passing over the many indorsements of this change by distinguished officers, I place a single statement of one of their own number:

As the staff of our Army is that portion by which the annual appropriations for the support of the Army are expended, a description of its duties, with some discussion of the manner in which these duties should be performed, would seem to be a matter not only of grave political importance, at this time especially, but of much personal interest to any one who pays taxes or who, as a voter, has a voice in the selection of the different members of the Government. Each voter or taxpayer in the country has an interest in requiring the efficiency of the staff to be raised to the highest degree, for by such efficiency only can the duties of the Army be performed in the most economical manner.

* * * * * * *

It is believed there are to-day officers in the staff departments, and, perhaps, even in the general staff, who are so ignorant of our own country and of military service on the frontier; who know so little of Indians and of their mode of warfare that if ordered to proceed from one frontier post to another, through a hostile Indian country, they would be unable to conduct their marches or manage their escorts so as to insure their own safety.

Such, sir, was the language used by Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Williams, a graduate of the Military Academy, an officer of twenty-seven years' service, and for the last eighteen years an assistant adjutant-general.

No one will deny that Colonel Williams is good authority upon this question, nor that his statement is conclusive evidence of the necessity for a change.

I might give many authorities in support of this provision of the bill. President Pierce recommended a similar measure in his message in 1855. Mr. Davis made a similar recommendation while Secretary of War. It was recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-third Congress, and is recommended by all of the field and line officers of our Army, so far as I have been able to procure their opinions.

Sections 13, 14, and 15 provide for the reorganization of the artillery so as to assimilate it to the organization provided by subsequent sections for the cavalry and infantry.

Sections 16 and 17 reduce the cavalry regiments from ten to eight, and fix the regimental and company organizations. This consolidation will dispense with two colonels, two lieutenant-colonels, and six majors, as well as the staff and company officers of two regiments The changes from the existing organization are to give an additional first lieutenant to each troop and to fix the maximum number of privates in a troop at seventy, so that the aggregate cavalry force in the new organization will amount to 8,432 officers and men.

Sections 18 and 19 provide for the reduction of the infantry regiments from twenty-five to eighteen, with the same battalion organization as in the cavalry.

The only change in the company organization is to fix the minimum of privates at seventy-five.

There are at present in the infantry:

Officers.	Present.	Bill.	Reductions.
Colonels	25	18	7
Lieutenant-colonels	25	18	7
Majors	25	54	.....
Captains	250	216	34
First lieutenants	300	216	84
Second lieutenants	250	216	34
Total net reductions	875	738	137

The infantry under this organization will consist of 13,500 officers and men.

All regiments are to have four battalions of four companies each, in time of war. The fourth battalion will be neither officered nor manned in time of peace nor until authorized by Congress.

Only eight companies or two battalions of each artillery and infantry regiment shall be manned, until ordered by Congress.

The cavalry is to be consolidated into two battalions to a regiment, as soon as the interest of the service will permit.

Appointments to the grade of second lieutenant are also restricted by this section to graduates of the Military Academy and meritorious soldiers.

The next changes are in section 26 and relate to the Quartermaster's Department. There are now in that department officers as follows:

Officers.	Present.	Bill.	Reductions.
Brigadier-general	1	1	.....
Colonels	5	2	3
Lieutenant-colonels	8	5	3
Majors	14	8	6
Captains	30	.....	30
Total	58	16	42

The detail of thirty captains and first lieutenants of the line to act as assistant quartermasters is also authorized by this section.

Section 27 relates to the Subsistence department and provides for reductions as follows:

Officers.	Present.	Bill.	Reductions.
Brigadier-general	1	1	.....
Colonels	2	1	1
Lieutenant-colonels	3	2	1
Majors	8	5	3
Captains	12	.....	12
Total	26	9	17

Like the preceding one, this section provides for the detail of captains and lieutenants of the line, not to exceed twelve in all.

Section 29 provides for the reduction and reorganization of the Ordnance department as follows:

Officers.	Present.	Bill.	Reductions.
Brigadier-general	1	1	.....
Colonels	3	2	1
Lieutenant-colonels	4	4	.....
Majors	10	8	2
Captains	20	.....	20
First lieutenants	16	.....	16
Second lieutenants	10	.....	10
Total	64	15	49

A detail of not exceeding thirty captains and first lieutenants of artillery to duty in the Ordnance department is also authorized by this section.

Section 31 reorganizes the Medical department and makes changes and reductions as follows:

Officers.	Present.	Bill.	Reductions.
Brigadier-general	1	1	.....
Colonels	6	6	.....
Lieutenant-colonels	10	10	.....
Majors	50	48	2
Captains and lieutenants	125	120	5
Total	192	185	7

Assistant surgeons are required by this section to serve for eight years before attaining to the rank of captain instead of five years as at present.

Section 33 prohibits the employment of contract surgeons except for and during an emergency and upon the recommendation of the commanding officer.

Section 34 proposes important changes in the Pay department. At present this department is organized as follows:

Officers.	Present.	The bill proposes.	Reductions.
Brigadier-general	1	1	.....
Colonels	2	1	1
Lieutenant-colonels	2	1	1
Majors	50	25	25
Total	55	28	27

A detail of ten captains and first lieutenants of the line to act as assistant paymasters when necessary is authorized by this section.

Section 37 relates to the Signal Bureau of the Army, but proposes no changes in existing law.

Section 38 reorganizes the Bureau of Military Justice as follows:

Officers.	Present.	Bill.	Reductions.
Brigadier-general	1	.....	1
Colonel	.....	1	.....
Majors	4	2	2
Total	5	3	2

The bill also authorizes the detail of three captains or lieutenants to act as assistant judge-advocates. There are now in the service four judge-advocates in excess of the number shown above, making eight in all. Under existing law their places are not to be filled as they become vacant.

RETIREMENT.

The bill provides for retirement and makes it compulsory at a certain age. The commission was impressed with the fact that the personnel of the Army is getting old, and in making reductions it seemed eminently proper that those who could not much longer serve the country should, with comfortable provision for the remainder of their days, make place for men who, though much younger, had been so long in the service as to unfit them for beginning at the bottom of the ladder in civil life.

The provisions for retirement differ from existing laws principally in the features of compulsory retirement for age and in graduating the pay of those upon the retired list, according as the case may be, to their length of service or the cause and degree of their disability. To these measures of reform there will of course be much opposition, but in my judgment it will come mainly from personal considerations. England and France have found it necessary to adopt a measure similar to the one proposed in this bill; that of England being far more radical than the one in the bill now under consideration.

It is not claimed that every officer of the Army becomes unfit for service at sixty-two years of age, but I do maintain that the great majority of American officers (for we live faster in this country than they do abroad) are at that age unfitted for active service, and that the retention of any officer of that age on the active list and in the line of and as a block to promotion works a positive injury to the service by retaining other officers in the lower grades until they have become too weary and aged for the proper performance of the duties of their subordinate positions. Not one of these aged officers, however distinguished, is indispensable to the country, and the interest of the younger officers are in this instance the interest of the country. There is, certainly, a time when officers become disqualified by age for the performance of their duties; many become unfit at sixty-two, and those who do not become unfit at that time become so very soon after. Taking the experience of other armies, our own experience in the Navy and observation in our own Army sixty-two is, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the commission, the best that could be adopted. Under the law as it now stands the President has the power to retire officers at sixty-two; so that if not retired before attaining that age on account of wounds or disability the officer hopes the President will retain him after that time.

Living in this hope—

writes an Army officer upon this subject,—

he neglects to make permanent arrangement for his old age, which he would make if retirement were compulsory. His postponed retirement, when at last it comes, finds him the more unprepared, and therefore seems to him the more cruel and unjust.

The same writer further says in favor of a law making retirement compulsory at sixty-two:

But the mischief of the matter in this connection is, that the present system itself tends to unfit the man over sixty-two for the performance of his duties. It is the strength and beauty of the service that its officers can act without fear or favor, according to their consciences, the best of their understanding, and the custom of war in like cases. This they can do, because they hold their places, not at the discretion of the President, but by the will of the people and until deprived of them by due course of law. The only exceptions to the independence secured through this most valuable principle are those of officers over sixty-two years of age. Their positions on the active list are dependent solely upon the President, who may displace them with or without cause or explanation. It is not human nature for an officer to be uninfluenced by this condition of his case. His official action, though he may not even know it, will very likely cease to be solely for the good of the service, and will be more or less governed by a desire simply to please the power which has such effective means of influencing him. The very circumstances, therefore, under which an officer by the present system remains on the active list after he is sixty-two tend to disqualify him for the performance of his duties according to the purest and highest Army standard.

In conclusion I give the reasons of another Army officer, which to my mind are unanswerable:

Such a law would relieve the Executive from many embarrassments and importunities; each officer on attaining the age of sixty-two years would retire, and no personal or political influence would grant him the favor of remaining while others went out.

Every officer would know the date when he must retire, and make his personal arrangements accordingly; but now the hope of securing a delay by influence prevents him from taking the necessary steps for the future.

It would not work a hardship to any one now on the active list. No one on the list now sixty-two years old remains in active service except by the personal favor of the President, to the evident injury and hardship of those below him, and injustice to those who have not been treated heretofore so leniently, thus giving color to the charge of partiality.

It is not right, just, or proper that the President should be called upon and influenced to keep an officer on the active list after he arrives at the age of sixty-two years, when one devoid of personal influence has to go.

It would save members of Congress much present annoyance in being called upon to intercede for some one desirous of retaining his position.

All the officers now eligible are of the general staff of the Army except one, which shows that practically the present law works a distinction in favor of the staff and against the line; that is, the law is practically obligatory as it affects the line, and discretionary as it affects the staff.

To retire an officer under the present law at the age of sixty-two years would seem to show prejudice against him individually, because there are and have been so many examples of others not more efficient being kept in the service after attaining that age, through personal or other influence.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will not take up the time of the House longer to explain the proposed amendments. Before I take my seat, however, I desire to call the attention of the House to the opinions expressed by Army officers of distinction concerning the proposed legislation. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from a letter of Captain Clapp, of the Sixteenth Infantry.

The Clerk read as follows:

Allow me to say that among officers of the line I hear no objections made to the bill reorganizing the Army, recently reported by you, but on the contrary it is spoken of with high favor, and there is an earnest wish that it may become a law. This is, I think, the opinion of a very large majority of the line officers of the Army, who see in it a chance for more varied service and a long stride in the direction of breaking down what is called the exclusiveness of the staff.

Mr. BANNING. I now ask to have read a letter of Colonel Dodge, of the Twenty-third Infantry.

The Clerk read as follows:

FORT HAYS, KANSAS, December 24, 1878.

GENERAL: I have just read the bill for the reorganization of the Army prepared by the joint commission.

By reason of long service and wide experience on the position, I may without vanity claim to be a fair exponent of the views and opinions of the line officers similarly situated. I therefore take the liberty of expressing them.

Aside from some few cases of injustice, even of real hardship, (inseparable from so radical a change, and the necessity for a rasher, mean economy, as for instance, the post chaplains,) I believe it would be impossible to frame a bill combining more admirable and valuable points. Taken as a whole, the organization proposed by this bill seems to me as nearly perfection as possible, and if Congress will pass the bill and allow it to work a few years without tinkering, I believe the result will be such as the committee, the Army, and the country may well be proud of.

To this end, however, it is most important that the bill pass in its entirety. If it is to be taken up and discussed section by section, modified here and there to suit the wishes of this or that staff officer, or changed to enable some influential head of a department to hold on to his position long after his days of usefulness have passed; if, in short, the most valuable features affecting the staff and retirements are to be thrown out under the pressure that will certainly be brought against them, the bill will result only in injustice and injury to individuals and incalculable mischief to the morale of the Army.

About two months ago I had the pleasure of discussing some of the questions involved with Senator PLUMB, without, of course, knowing what would likely be proposed by the bill.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

RICH'D I. DODGE,
Lieutenant-Colonel Twenty-third Infantry.

General A. E. BURNSIDE,
United States Senate.

Mr. BANNING. I now ask to have read an extract from a letter from Major Bates, paymaster, United States Army, stationed at San Antonio, Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

The other three departments (meaning the Commissary, Quartermaster's, and Pay Departments) stand on the same basis. The personnel of all three is poor, very poor. Nearly all the officers who would be affected by the proposed change have obtained their positions through a vicious system of personal and political favoritism, which is at the bottom of all the opposition from these departments.

I know what I say, when I assert that there are not more than five or six men who now hold the positions of captains and quartermasters, captains and commissaries, and majors and paymasters, who would be selected by the commanding generals of our departments for any important duties whatever, to say nothing of placing them in positions where the comfort of the service and efficiency of the Army depend to a great extent on their personal ability.

* * * * * * *

I say that some legislation is necessary, and in all probability will be had soon on the Army, and that this bill comes nearer what we want than anything we are likely to get, or that we had or ought to hope for, and I see here a chance for our true friends in Congress to do us a good turn, and at the same time confer a great benefit on the country at large.

* * * * * * * *

I have talked with all the officers here, including General E. O. C. Ord, commanding, and can say the bill meets with the unanimous approval of all, both line and staff. General Ord authorized me to say that he saw no feature in the bill that would not work for the good of the service.

Mr. BANNING. I also ask to have read a letter of Colonel Andrews, of the Twenty-fifth Infantry.

The Clerk read as follows:

FORT DAVIS, TEXAS, December 30, 1878.

SIR: Permit me to express the hope that the bill recently presented by the select committee on Army reorganization may receive the favorable action of Congress. While the bill contains several objectionable provisions, which experience will demonstrate and future legislation probably eliminate, as a whole it is so decidedly a move in the right direction that all who have the true interest of the Army at heart and desire its greatest efficiency and economy must forego all selfish objections and earnestly desire the bill may become a law.

With compliments of the season, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE L. ANDREWS,
Colonel Twenty-fifth Infantry.

To Hon. H. B. BANNING, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BANNING. I now send to the Clerk's desk to have read a letter of Colonel Stanley, Twenty-second Infantry, a major-general in our volunteer army, and one of the ablest and most accomplished officers in our service.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUFFALO, NEW YORK, December 15, 1878.

DEAR GENERAL: I have only seen a synopsis of the bill of the military commission, but have seen enough to induce me to congratulate you on your work. If this fails to become a law, Army reform may as well be given up. One thing I think is certain. Our staff system must be reformed or it will pull the Army into the gutter. Of course the abolishing of bands is distasteful and, I think, a mistake; but we can stand a little bitter with the sweet. I sincerely hope you may pass the bill. I believe nine-tenths of the line would indorse me.

Yours, truly,

D. S. STANLEY.

Mr. BANNING. I now ask to have read a letter of Colonel Shafter, Twenty-fourth Infantry, an officer of experience and capacity, who served with great distinction in our volunteer army during the late war.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF THE NUECES.
Fort Clark, Texas, December 27, 1878.

DEAR GENERAL: I received the Army bill by last mail under your frank; am much obliged for your kindness. At this post (the largest in the United States, having infantry, cavalry, and artillery) there is not an opponent to the bill; on the contrary it gives the greatest satisfaction.

It is by far the most comprehensive and best system for the organization of the Army that has ever been presented to Congress.

I believe I can safely say for the whole line of the Army, and I know I can for our regiment of infantry, one of cavalry, and two companies of artillery, that it is the earnest wish of the officers that the bill be passed just as presented by the committee.

I am, dear general, very truly yours,

W. R. SHAFTER,
Lieutenant-Colonel Twenty-fourth Infantry.

Hon. H. B. BANNING, M. C.,
Willard's Hotel, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BANNING. I now ask to have read an extract from a letter of Colonel Upton, of the Fourth Artillery, one of our ablest military critics, who was recently sent abroad to study and report upon the military systems of European nations.

The Clerk read as follows:

As an officer of the line whose promotion may be retarded for two or three years, I desire to express my approval of all the main features of the new Army bill, which without any vital changes I trust may speedily become a law. The principles of expansion, interchangeability between the staff and the line in the lower grades and compulsory retirement, in connection with the new regulations will, if adhered to and adopted, mark the greatest improvement in military organization and policy ever accomplished by any one Congress.

Mr. BANNING. I now ask to have read the letter of Colonel Silas Casey, brevet major-general United States Army, a distinguished veteran of more than half a century of service, and who served during the late war as a major-general of volunteers in our Army.

The Clerk read as follows:

No. 155 SOUTH OXFORD STREET, BROOKLYN, December 25, 1878.

DEAR GENERAL: Having lately read the new Army bill, I cannot refrain from expressing to you my warm approbation of the following portion, which I consider eminently vital to the efficiency of the Army, and consequent for the good of the country:

First. Those sections which relate to a retired and reserved list.

Second. Those which require an examination for promotion until the grade of a field officer has been attained.

Third. Maintaining small staff permanent organizations and supplying the requisite number by details from the line.

Fourth. Fitting the permanent staff positions by the competition of line officers are happy ideas; the result will be to inspire with zeal and hope those subordinate officers of the Army who spend their lives on the remote frontier, away from civilization, and who from the need of something better to occupy their minds are apt to fall into habits of idleness and at times of dissipation.

They will now have some inducement to cultivate their minds and control their habits.

In short, the sections which I have enumerated tend to inspire hope and uniform good character.

The wisest laws for the government of an army will fail in their object without character to administer them.

I have no hesitation in saying that the committee will be entitled to be called public benefactors should they succeed in passing the bill through the Houses of Congress with the above-named vital principles intact.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SILAS CASEY,
Brevet Major-General, United States Army.

General A. E. BURNSIDE,
Chairman Joint Committee Army Organization.

Mr. BANNING. I will detain the House with but one more letter, (although I have one from the General of the Army and letters from many other officers,) and that is from Major-General Schofield, whose opinions upon military law and army organization are held in esteem by all:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF WEST POINT,
UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY,
West Point, N. Y., December 20, 1878.

DEAR GENERAL: I have made a careful examination of the fundamental provisions of the bill recently reported to Congress by the joint commission on the reorganization of the Army, and I do not hesitate to say that I believe the bill merits the cordial support of the Army. The provisions relating to organization, command, and administration are in conformity to the principles recognized by the foremost military nations of the present day, and are well adapted to the peculiarities of our military establishment, of our form of government, and of our country, considering the vast territory which our small Army must occupy.

After the very careful study I have given to this subject; especially during the last ten and a half years, during which I have devoted to it a large part of my time and best effort, it seems to me that we can hardly hope for a better military system than that which this bill proposes. I speak not of the details in which there may doubtless be some room for amendment, but of the essential principles, which I am sure are correct.

It cannot be expected that the staff department will generally support such a measure as this. No man, nor any body of men, ever voluntarily relinquished any part of the independent authority which has once been possessed and exercised. But a sound and healthy system once inaugurated, will soon have the cordial support of all.

Above all the bill proposes to give us what has long been sorely needed, namely, a well-matured system, complete in all its essential features, and established by law, in place of the heterogeneous mass of regulations, customs, and special legislation heretofore adopted, and incessantly changed to meet the views and interests of individuals or of special branches of the service.

The administrative details embodied in the bill are a careful compilation of the results of our experience of a hundred years. With slight exceptions they are the regulations now in force, so far as the most diligent research has given the knowledge what these regulations really are, a knowledge possessed by none but the very few officers who have devoted special study to that intricate subject.

It is certainly wise to now give to those well-matured rules the sanction and comparative stability of an act of Congress. The important changes which the bill proposes in these rules are only those necessary to regulate and fix the due responsibility and authority of all in the military service regarded as components of one harmonious organization—an army, in place of several independent or semi-independent military establishments. The organization proposed has the important merit of elasticity. It is capable of rapid expansion and contraction to meet the varying necessities of the country and the first demands of economy. But above all it gives great facilities for the highest education of the Army. It affords the young officers opportunities to become familiar with nearly all the branches of the service, and thus fits them in a high degree for the duties which the rapid organization, equipment, instruction, and command of a great army must require of them. Experience has already demonstrated that with few exceptions three or four years are as much time as a young officer can profitably spend in the duties of any one special service. Beyond that time his usefulness, even in that special service, no longer increases, and he rapidly becomes unfit for anything else. Promotion, giving him a wider sphere of duty, or a change of specialty, is essential to his full activity and to the continuous development of his faculties. But promotion in time of peace must needs be slow, far more slow than that which would give the greatest efficiency. Hence periodical changes of special service afford the necessary means for the best development of the young officer's character and faculties, in addition to the inestimable advantage of such general education and experience as will fit him for any duty which the sudden demands of a great war may require of him to perform.

Naturally enough we who are in the Army think the Army is already too small and dislike to see it reduced; but it is for Congress to judge how large an Army the country needs, and for us to do all in our power to make that Army as effective and useful as possible. If the number of officers must be reduced, certainly no one can complain that the provisions of this bill for the reduction are not just and fair.

I sincerely hope that this measure, which has manifestly been dictated by the best spirit toward the Army, as well as by a sense of duty to the country, will receive from all officers the cordial acquiescence and support which it merits.

I am, dear general, very truly yours,

J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Major-General United States Army.

General W. T. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. Chairman, these approvals and commendations of the bill by such distinguished officers are certainly the very best evidences that the bill is a good one and should become a law. These officers all belong to the line, except Paymaster Bates, and his service is in Texas with troops. They assure the House that officers of the line are in favor of the bill and desire its passage.

I know, sir, the bill is opposed by the staff, and that they have lobbied long and hard and earnestly to prevent its passage—not in the interest of the Army, nor of the country—but for the sole and only purpose of preserving and saving for themselves the fat, comfortable, useless, extravagant, and expensive positions they now fill.

Sir, if this bill becomes a law it will accomplish the following organization of the engineers, artillery, cavalry, infantry, and Indian scouts, namely:

Line organization.

First. That a "reserved list" be established, to which officers shall be transferred from the line and staff, when not otherwise disposed of, as hereinafter directed.

Second. That so much of existing laws as limits the number of officers that may at any one time be on the "retired list" is hereby suspended.

Third. That every officer who has been thirty years in service may, upon his own application, be placed upon the retired list; that every officer, other than of the corps of general officers, who shall be sixty-two years of age at the passage of this act, and shall then have served for ten years as an officer, shall be at once retired; that all such officers who, at the passage of this act, shall be between the ages of sixty and sixty-two, shall be at once transferred to the reserved list, and as they attain the age of sixty-two they shall be placed on the retired list; and that every officer who shall be over sixty years of age at the passage of this act, and shall not then have rendered at least ten years' service as an officer, shall be discharged with the gratuity provided in clause 4 of this section: Provided, That each year's service in time of war shall count as two years' ordinary service.

Fourth. That every officer, other than those referred to in clause 3 of this section, who is unfit from any cause whatever for the proper and efficient discharge of his military duties, shall, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, be either discharged from the service or placed upon the retired list. If the disabilities be the result of intemperance or other vicious habits, the officer shall be discharged with a gratuity of one year's pay if he shall have served at least three years; if it be neither the result of vicious habits nor of any incident of the service, he shall be discharged with a gratuity at the rate of one year's pay for each period of five years' service rendered, either as an officer or soldier in the regular or volunteer forces of the United States; but if the disability be the result of injuries received or disease contracted in the line of his duty, the officer shall be placed upon the retired list.

Fifth. That the chiefs of the several departments and bureaus of the staff, the commanders of the several geographical divisions and departments, of the Corps of Engineers, of the several regiments and military posts, and of detachments in the field, shall, as soon as practicable, and before the 1st day of June, 1879, forward through and for the remarks of the Commanding General of the Army to the Secretary of War, a list of the officers belonging to their respective departments, bureaus, or commands deemed by them unfit from any cause for the proper and efficient discharge of their duty. The cause of such unfitness shall be fully and specifically set forth in each case, with a list of witnesses and reference to any documental evidence.

Sixth. That a board, to consist of not less than three of the highest general officers available for the purpose, and of two surgeons, and that shall have a recorder, shall be appointed by the President, to examine into the qualifications and habits of every officer affected by the reports or records referred to in clause fifth of this section, and not disposed of by age under clause third. The members of the board and the recorder shall be sworn to a faithful discharge of their duties; and the board shall have power to compel the witnesses necessary in any case, whether they be civilian or military, to appear and testify.

Seventh. That the reports and records called for by clause fifth of this section, and such special reports in relation thereto as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of War, shall be referred to the board of examiners aforesaid, for the investigation necessary in each case; and upon the recommendation of the board, approved by the President, the officers unfavorably reported upon shall, in accordance with clause fourth of this section, be either retired or discharged: Provided, That no officer shall thus be retired or discharged until he has been allowed an opportunity to appear before the board and show cause against such action.

Eighth. That the present Adjutant and Inspector General's departments shall be consolidated into the department to be known as the general staff; that the present cavalry force shall be consolidated into eight regiments, and the present infantry force into eighteen regiments; and that the enlisted men of ordnance, artillery, cavalry, and infantry shall be so transferred as to establish as soon as may be the reorganization in view: Provided, That no non-commissioned officer or first-class private shall be forced to serve in a lower grade.

Ninth. That from the officers remaining upon the active list of the line and staff, after the process of elimination hereinbefore prescribed has been completed, and before the 1st day of January, 1880, the President, according to their seniority, shall, by retention in their present positions and by the necessary transfers and promotions, arrange the proper complement of officers to each of the departments and bureaus of the staff, and to the several corps and regiments of the line. Upon this arrangement being made, the supernumerary officers shall be transferred to the reserved list: Provided, That this act in discontinuing certain grades and titles of office shall not thereby vacate the commissions of the present incumbents, but they shall be retained, retired, transferred, promoted, or discharged, as other officers, according to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 41. That the "reserved list" shall be maintained for three years, or till Congress shall otherwise direct: Provided, That no additions shall be made thereto after the reorganization of the Army has been accomplished; and that the officers upon this list shall, except as hereinafter provided, receive the pay and allowances of officers of like rank retired by reason of age or length of service, and no more: And provided further, That any officer of the Army may, within six months from the passing of this act, upon his own application, and at the discretion of the President, be transferred to the reserved list.

SEC. 42. That every officer upon the reserved list who may tender his resignation within six months after his transfer thereto, shall be entitled, upon the acceptance of such resignation, to receive three years' full pay of his rank, less the amounts previously paid to him as an officer on that list.

SEC. 43. That officers upon the reserved list shall remain subject in all respects to the Rules and Articles of War, and when employed upon any duty that may be recognized by law, they shall receive the full pay and allowances of their rank.

SEC. 44. That officers of the regular Army shall be transferred from the active list to the retired list, on account of age, as follows, namely: first, general officers, upon attaining the age of sixty-five years, unless the President shall otherwise specially direct; second, all officers other than those hereinbefore mentioned, upon reaching sixty-two years of age: Provided, That nothing in this or in following sections shall be construed in derogation of the provisions of section 40 of this act.

SEC. 45. That any officer of the regular Army who shall have served forty years either as an officer or soldier in the regular or volunteer service, shall, upon his own application, be transferred to the retired list; and upon such application he may be thus transferred at the discretion of the President, at any time after twenty-five years' such service.

SEC. 46. That when any officer of the regular Army shall have become incapable of performing the duties of his office, he shall be either transferred to the retired list, or be discharged from the service, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 47. The chiefs of the several departments and bureaus of the staff, and the commanders of the geographical divisions and departments, of the Corps of Engineers, and of the several regiments, shall from time to time, and at least once in each year, report to the Commanding General of the Army for the information of the Secretary of War and of the President, all officers belonging to their several departments, bureaus, or commands who are deemed incapable for the performance of the duties of their several offices; and the officers thus reported shall, as soon as practicable, be summoned before a retiring board for examination.

SEC. 48. That under the direction of the President, the Secretary of War shall from time to time assemble Army retiring boards to examine the cases of officers reported upon, as indicated in next preceding section, or who may for other reasons be deemed incapable for the performance of their proper duties.

SEC. 49. That a retiring board shall consist of not more than nine nor less than five officers, two-fifths of whom shall be selected from the surgeons of the Army, and as far as may be, the members, other than the medical officers, shall be senior in rank to the officer to be examined.

SEC. 50. That a retiring board shall inquire into and determine the facts touching the nature and occasion of the disability of any officer who appears to be incapable of performing the duties of his office; it shall have such of the powers of a general court-martial as may be necessary for that purpose; and the members shall be sworn in every case to discharge their duties honestly and impartially; and no officer shall be transferred to the retired list or be discharged upon the recommendation of the board without a full and fair hearing before it, if upon due summons he shall demand such hearing.

SEC. 51. That when a retiring board finds that an officer is incapacitated for active service, it shall also find and report the cause of such incapacity and whether or not it has resulted from an incident of the service. And the board shall recommend, upon due consideration of the officer's age and the other circumstances of the case, whether his disability shall be rated as total, three-fourths, or one-half.

SEC. 52. That the proceedings and findings of a retiring board shall be transmitted to the Secretary of War and shall by him be laid before the President for his action; and no decision of the board shall be carried into effect until the proceedings shall have been personally examined by the President and such decision personally approved by him.

SEC. 53. That when a retiring board finds that an officer is incapacitated for active service, and that the incapacity is the result of an incident of service, the officer shall be transferred to the retired list. If it be found that the incapacity results neither from an incident of the service nor from any vicious habit of the officer, he shall be transferred to the retired list or be discharged, as the President, upon the recommendation of the board, may direct. But if it be found that the officer's incapacity is the result of intemperance, idleness, or other vicious habit, he shall be discharged.

SEC. 54. That all officers hereafter transferred to the retired list shall be borne on that list with the corps rank actually held by them at the date of their retirement; or, if retired by reason of wounds received in action, upon the highest corps rank actually held by them, in the regular or volunteer service, at the time the disability was incurred.

SEC. 55. That officers transferred to the retired list on account of age or length of service shall thereafter be entitled to receive 2 per cent. of the current yearly pay of the rank upon which they are retired, for each and every year's service rendered, either as an officer or as a soldier in the regular or volunteer service: Provided, That the retired pay of an officer under this section shall in no case exceed 80 per cent. of the pay of the rank upon which he is retired; and that each year's service in time of war shall count as two years' ordinary service.

SEC. 56. That an officer transferred to the retired list on account of incapacity resulting from an incident of the service shall thereafter be entitled to receive the full pay of the rank upon which he is retired if the disability be total, 70 per cent. of that pay if the disability be three-fourths, and 50 per cent. if the disability be one-half or less. If the incapacity for which the officer is thus retired be not the result of an incident of the service, he shall be entitled to receive 70 per cent. of the pay of the rank upon which he is retired if the disability be total, 50 per cent. if the disability is three-fourths, and 25 per cent. if it be only one-half or less. But in no case shall the pay of an officer retired for incapacity be less than that which he would have received if retired on account of age or for length of service.

SEC. 57. That the officers now on the retired list shall, as soon as practicable, be rated for pay in accordance with the provisions of this act; and for the purpose of determining the pay of those transferred to that list on account of incapacity, the President is authorized and requested to appoint a special retiring board, consisting of one general officer, five colonels, (namely, one of artillery, one of cavalry, one of infantry, and two from the staff departments,) and three surgeons. Upon an examination of the records in each case, and after taking such additional testimony as may appear necessary, this board shall recommend whether, in view of the present circumstances of each case, the officer's disability should be rated as total, three-fourths, or one-half; but the pay of an officer shall not be reduced under the operation of this section without his having had a full and fair hearing before the board, if upon due notice of such contemplated reduction he shall promptly demand such hearing; nor shall the recommendation of the board determine the rate of pay in any case until it shall have been approved by the President.

SEC. 58. That when an officer shall be discharged under the provisions of section 53 of this act, for incapacity not resulting from his own vicious habits, he shall thereupon be entitled to receive a gratuity of not to exceed three years' pay of his rank, said gratuity to be fixed by the President, upon the recommendation of the board; and if the incapacity be the result of his own vicious habits, the officer may, at the discretion of the President, receive a gratuity upon his discharge, not exceeding one year's pay of his rank.

SEC. 59. That officers transferred to the retired list on account of incapacity shall from time to time, and at the discretion of the President, be re-examined by a retiring board, in order that any proper change in the rating of their disabilities may be made; and if it shall appear upon a re-examination that an officer has become fully qualified for active service, he may, on the occurrence of an appropriate vacancy, be transferred to the active list.

SEC. 60. That officers transferred to the retired list shall be withdrawn from command and the line of promotion, but shall continue subject to the rules and articles of war, shall be entitled to wear the uniform to which they were entitled on the active list, and their names shall be borne on the Army Register.

SEC. 61. That none other than retired officers shall be eligible for appointment as governor, deputy governor, or treasurer of the Soldiers' Home; that upon their own application retired officers may be placed in charge of unoccupied military posts, and while on such duty shall be entitled to fuel and quarters in kind; and upon like application they may be assigned to duty at any college or university entitled under the law to the detail of an Army officer; but they shall not be assignable to duties other than those herein indicated, nor shall they receive any compensation from the Government other than their pay as retired officers that is not expressly authorized by law.

SEC. 62. That the general officers shall be selected from the Army; the major-generals from the brigadier-generals, and the brigadier-generals from the field officers of the line.

SEC. 63. That the chiefs of the general staff of the staff departments and of the Corps of Engineers shall be selected from the Army; the Chief of Engineers from the field officers of that corps; the Surgeon-General from the officers of the Medical department above the rank of assistant surgeon; the Chief of Ordnance from the field officers of ordnance and artillery; and the chiefs of the other branches of the staff from the field officers either of the bureau or department in which the vacancy occurs or of the line.

SEC. 64. That appointments into the lowest permanent grades in the several departments and bureaus of the staff shall, except in the Medical department, be made by selection, upon competitive examination, from such officers as have served not less than three years in that branch of the staff in which the appointment is to be made.

SEC. 65. That promotion in the regular Army from the lowest commissioned grade into that of colonel shall, except as hereinafter provided, be made by seniority throughout the several lines of engineers, artillery, cavalry, and infantry, and in each of the departments of the staff, and not regimentally as heretofore. Graduated cadets of the same date shall take precedence in the order of rank established at the Military Academy.

SEC. 66. The details for duty in the general staff, other than aids-de-camp, and in the several staff departments and bureaus, except as provided in section 28 of this act, shall be made by the President by selections after consideration of the nominations that may be submitted by the Commanding General of the Army: Provided, That except in cases of emergency no officer shall be thus detailed against his will, nor in any case till he has served at least six years with his regiment, and that no such details shall be for a longer period than three years or, except at the Military Academy, for two successive terms in the same department of the staff; and that as far as may be these details, except for ordnance duty, shall be equalized between the corps of artillery, cavalry, and infantry.

SEC. 67. That by transfers within each regiment a due proportion of officers shall be maintained with each of the manned battalions; and the President may from time to time make such temporary transfers to and from the cavalry as may be necessary to give that corps its proportion of the officers for staff duty, without impairing the efficiency of the cavalry service.

SEC. 68. That an officer detailed for duty in the staff shall not thereby forfeit either his lineal position, or right to promotion in the line; but when an officer is appointed into a permanent grade of the staff he shall thereupon vacate his commission in the line. Those officers appointed to the additional offices provided for in section 36 of this act, shall, upon discharge therefrom, be entitled to resume their relative positions in their proper corps, as though they had not been thus appointed.

SEC. 69. That general officers shall appoint their own secretaries and aids-de-camp; and the commanders of regiments, and of the engineer battalion, shall appoint their several adjutants and quartermasters: Provided, That hereafter no one shall be appointed secretary or aid-de-camp till he has served six years with his regiment or corps, nor shall any one remain on such duty for a longer period than three years.

SEC. 70. That for the purpose of promoting knowledge of military art and science among the young men of the United States, the President may, upon the application of any established college or university within the United States, having capacity to educate not less than one hundred and fifty male students at the same time, detail an officer of the Army to act as president, superintendent, or professor thereof; and the officers thus detailed shall be apportioned throughout the United States as nearly as may be according to population: Provided, That the number of officers to be thus detailed shall not exceed seventy-six from the reserved and retired lists; and such retired officers while serving on these details shall receive $20 a month extra pay.

SEC. 71. That the Secretary of War shall prescribe rules for the government of the officers detailed at the several colleges and universities aforesaid; he shall require those officers to state in their monthly reports the precise nature of their duties; and he shall cause inspections to be made from time to time in order to ascertain whether or not a proper course of military instruction is maintained at those institutions, and where such is not the case he shall withdraw the officer detailed.

SEC. 72. That the Secretary of War shall from time to time report to Congress whether or not a proper course of instruction in military tactics is maintained at the several colleges endowed with the proceeds of the sale of public lands, as stipulated in the act of July 2, 1862.

SEC. 73. That officers on duty at the several colleges and universities may during the stated vacations have leave of absence without deduction from their pay or allowances.

SEC. 74. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] who has the Army appropriation bill in charge, for the courtesy of not objecting, at this time, to a discussion of some features of the Army reorganization bill, which indeed is cognate to an Army appropriation bill. The House having refused to proceed to consider the Army bill to-day, the intention now is, as I understand from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING,] to offer the different sections of the Army reorganization bill as an amendment to the pending appropriation bill. It is quite proper for me, then, to explain the proposed amendments. These amendments are embraced in the bill I hold in my hand, submitted by the gentleman from Ohio on the 24th of January by instructions of the joint committee on the reorganization of the Army, in the nature of a substitute for House bill No. 5499. To that I propose to speak. This, then, is a measure, sir, to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States; it is brief and comprehensive. Any proposition affecting the United States Army always excites active interest, and usually here in Washington meets industrious opposition.

The influence of Army personnel reaches over the whole country. No proposition is ever made in Congress to reorganize or modify the military establishment in any way without encountering the charge of premeditated injustice and unfairness to a large class of individuals. Such criticism will not dismay or discourage the sincere public man in advocating those changes and reforms proper for this important department of the public service.

ARMY REORGANIZATION DIFFICULT.

Since our country has had an army, bitter resistance has always been made to any change in the existing organization. The establishment of any general principle usually affects here and there some individual interest, and I know individuals, possibly affected, have been most earnest in misrepresenting the provisions of this bill and industriously manufacturing public sentiment against it. Every member of Congress, doubtless, has been waited upon since this bill has been reported to the House, and informed of the anticipated resulting grievance if it is enacted into a law. The early days of the Republic furnish abundant parallel when legislation affecting the Army was proposed, and in this connection it may be entertaining to remark, that army reorganization encountered as much opposition in the infant days of the Government as now. In 1776, feeling the want of more system in the discipline of the Army, George Washington suggested to Congress the revision of the articles of war. John Adams and Thomas Jefferson were appointed a committee to discuss, be informed and report on the subject to the House.

JOHN ADAMS.

Mr. Adams, in his works, volume 3, page 68, says:

It was a very difficult and unpopular subject, and I observed to Jefferson that whatever alteration we should report with the least energy in it, or the least tendency to a necessary discipline of the Army, would be opposed with as much vehemence as if it were the most perfect. We might as well, therefore, report a complete system at once and let it meet its fate. Something, perhaps, might be gained. There was extant one system of articles of war which had carried two empires to the head of mankind, the Roman and the British; for the British articles of war were a literal translation of the Roman. It would be in vain for us to seek in our own inventions or the records of warlike nations for a more complete system of military discipline. I was, therefore, for reporting the British articles of war totidem verbis. Jefferson in those days never failed to agree with me in everything of a political nature, and he very cordially concurred in this.

And again, page 83, says Mr. Adams:

In Congress Jefferson never spoke, and all the labor of the debate on these articles, paragraph by paragraph, was thrown upon me, and such was the opposition and so undigested were the notions of liberty prevalent among the majority of the members, most zealously attached to the public cause, that to this day I scarcely know how it was possible that these articles could have been carried. They were adopted and governed the Army. Resolutions for raising eighty-eight battalions, with a bounty for enlisting the men during the war, granting lands, * * * were then passed. The articles of war and the institution of the Army during the war were all my work, and yet I have been represented as an enemy of a regular army.

While every public man will recognize the truth of what Mr. Adams said, when speaking on army discipline in 1776, "that it was our observation, founded on undoubted facts, that the prosperity of nations had been in proportion to the discipline of the forces by sea and land," yet for years past public inquiry has been repeated, "ought not something to be done to decrease the expense of the military establishment without in any way impairing its efficiency?" No wonder this inquiry should be made, for by reference to your appropriation bills for the current year it will be discovered that nearly $30,000,000 were appropriated for the use of the Army in its different departments! A comparison of these figures with appropriations for former years exhibit the fact that the expense of this arm of the public service is not rapidly decreasing. While there has been a commendable desire upon the part of all in authority to preserve its efficiency, there has been a laudable willingness to see if by prudent effort the expense of our Army could not be reduced.

ARMY COMMISSION.

Hence, at your last session in your Army appropriation bill there was made the provision that three Senators and five Members of the House should be appointed a joint committee, to whom the whole subject of army revision and reorganization should be referred, and that such "committee shall carefully and thoroughly examine into the matter with reference to the demands of the public service, as to the number and pay of men and officers, and the proportion of the several arms; and also as to the rank, pay, and duties of the several staff corps, and whether any and what reductions can be made, either in the line, field, or staff, in numbers or in pay, by consolidation or otherwise, consistently with the public service, having in view a just and reasonable economy in the expenditure of public money, the actual necessities of the military service, and in the capacity for effective and rapid increase in time of war."

The proposed bill then comes from the hands of the committee thus authorized by law, and with the unanimous sanction of its members. On the 12th of December last this committee reported a bill, somewhat voluminous in character, to be found upon your files, No. 5499, and containing some seven hundred and twenty-four sections. While this bill was large in volume its exclusively new legislation embraced but small compass. The greater portion of it recited mere regulations for the business management of the Army. No formal Army regulations having been compiled or published since the Revised Regulations of 1863, it was deemed wise by the committee to collate and codify the regulations now in use, suggesting such changes as were deemed proper, so that if the bill was enacted by Congress it should embrace a complete system of laws organizing and regulating the military establishment in all its departments. A close scrutiny of the voluminous bill would have developed that its bulk was caused by inserting Army regulations which few would object to. Why, sir, the British army articles of war, which are somewhat voluminous, are re-enacted every year by Parliament in the mutiny act. Army regulations, indeed, should have the sanction of law, and hence they were reported as indicated for action. The magnitude of the bill 5499, as originally reported, discouraged many legislators from investigating its provisions.

The present session approaching its close the joint committee deemed it wise to divide the bill originally reported into two parts and let them be separately considered. In that form a new report has been made.

REORGANIZATION BILL BRIEF.

The bill we now propose, for which I now speak, embraces but seventy-four sections, containing practically all the bill originally reported, and relates to mere reorganization and reduction of the Army. There has been omitted from this bill those features relating to the transmission of all orders through the General of the Army and the prohibition of the further fabrication of arms at the Government arsenals. Those subjects, together with the mere regulation, are in the other bill, which is not pressed for action just now, but will be considered at another time. So, then, let it be understood that some necessary features of reorganization are omitted from the bill I hold in my hand. Pardon me while I present briefly some of its more salient provisions.

A PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The leading thought of this measure is to create an army on a peace establishment, so practical and plastic in its organization that it can be instantly developed in time of war to twice, indeed thrice, its original strength without impairing efficiency or discipline. It has been said that our Army is top-heavy; that we have too many officers in the higher grades; that the staff departments are too numerous and too large for the line of the Army. To relieve this confusion is the great leading purpose of the bill. Under it the permanent general officers shall be two major-generals and four brigadier-generals.

GENERAL STAFF.

The Adjutant and Inspector general's departments are consolidated and called the general staff; to be composed of one brigadier-general, three colonels, six lieutenant colonels, eight majors. Captains and first lieutenants, not exceeding fifteen, to be detailed by the President.

The Quartermaster's Department to have as a permanent organization one brigadier-general, two colonels, five lieutenant colonels, eight majors. Captains and first lieutenants of the line, not exceeding thirty, to be detailed by the President.

The Subsistence department to have as a permanent organization one brigadier, one colonel, two lieutenant colonels, five majors. Captains and first lieutenants from the line, not exceeding twelve, to be detailed by the President.

The Medical department to have as a permanent organization one brigadier-general, six colonels, ten lieutenant colonels, forty-eight majors, one hundred and twenty assistant surgeons, with rank of first lieutenant for first eight years' service and captain thereafter.

Contract surgeons to be employed in the Medical department only in an emergency, upon application of the Surgeon-General and approved by the Commanding General of the Army.

The Pay department shall consist of one brigadier-general, one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, twenty-five majors.

The Ordnance department shall have as a permanent organization one brigadier-general, two colonels, four lieutenant-colonels, eight majors, and such captains and first lieutenants of the artillery, not exceeding thirty, as the President may detail.

The Bureau of Military Justice shall have a judge-advocate-general with the rank of colonel, two judge-advocates with the rank of major, and such captains and first lieutenants of the line, not exceeding three, as may be detailed by the President.

The Signal Bureau shall consist of one signal officer with the rank of colonel, and such captains and first lieutenants from the line, not exceeding six, to be detailed by the President.

The Engineer department has not been changed.

Post-traders, after the 1st of January next, shall be abolished, and no person thereafter shall have an exclusive privilege of trading upon any military reservation or within any military camp or garrison.

In the staff departments thus enumerated by careful counting there will be a reduction of two hundred and one officers. It will be observed under this bill the permanent officers of staff departments shall not be below the rank of major. The captains and lieutenants necessary for duty will be supplied from the line by detail of the President for a period not exceeding three years at one time, and none to be detailed until they shall have served at least six years with their regiments. These details to be made from the artillery, cavalry, and infantry, respectively, as nearly equal as may be from these different corps; details for the Ordnance department to be made only from the artillery.

CHIEFS OF STAFF.

The chiefs of the general staff and of the staff departments and Corps of Engineers, when vacancies arise, shall be selected from the Army: the Chief of Engineers from the field officers of that corps, the Surgeon-General from the officers of the Medical department above the rank of an assistant surgeon, the Chief of Ordnance from the field officers of the Ordnance and Artillery. Appointments into the lowest permanent grades in the staff bureaus and departments, excepting in the Medical department, to be selected, after competitive examination, among officers who have served not less than three years in the branch of the staff in which the appointment is to be made.

THE LINE.

The line of the Army under this bill shall consist of five regiments of artillery, each regiment to have four battalions of four batteries each, with one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, three majors, twelve captains, twenty-four first lieutenants, and twelve second lieutenants. That each battery of artillery shall consist of sixty men, including the non-commissioned officers. The cavalry shall be composed of eight regiments of four battalions each, four troops or companies to each battalion, one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, three majors, one chaplain, twelve captains, twenty-four first lieutenants, and twelve second lieutenants. Each troop of cavalry shall have eighty-three men, including the non-commissioned officers. The corps of infantry shall have eighteen regiments, each regiment four battalions of four companies each, with one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, three majors, one chaplain, twelve captains, twelve first and twelve second lieutenants. Each company of infantry shall have not less than eighty-eight men, including the non-commissioned officers. All regiments of the line shall have an adjutant and quartermaster, detailed from the first lieutenants of the regiment instead of in addition thereto. Now, it will be observed the fourth battalions of the different corps shall be neither officered nor manned until Congress shall so direct. The third-battalion companies of artillery and infantry shall be officered but not manned. The third-battalion companies of cavalry, all of which are now officered and manned, shall be unmanned by the President as rapidly as in his judgment the good of the public service will allow. The provision is also found that, if the President shall deem it wise, any portion of the artillery or cavalry may be equipped and employed as infantry and any portion of the infantry may be mounted for the service. This latter, indeed, does not change existing law.

PROMOTIONS.

The general officers shall be selected from the Army: major-generals from the brigadiers and brigadiers from the field officers of the line. The further provision is made that promotions from the lowest commissioned grade into that of colonel shall be made by seniority in the different lines of engineers, artillery, cavalry, and infantry, and in each of the departments of the staff.

Promotions shall not be regimentally, as heretofore, but in the entire corps of the different arms in the line of the Army. Details for staff duty shall be made by the President. These, then, sir, are substantially all the very material provisions for the reorganization of the Army. The title of the bill indicates that it is a measure to reduce as well as to reorganize the Army.

NO REDUCTION OF MEN.

Mark you, sir, no violent reduction of the rank and file of the Army is proposed nor provided in the pending measure. By the act of the 15th of June, 1870, it was provided that "there shall not be in the Army at one time more than 30,000 enlisted men." This was the law until last session the maximum of the rank and file of the Army was fixed at 25,000 enlisted men. This legislation so recent may be regarded as an authoritative expression of popular sentiment as to the size of the enlisted force of the Army. While the maximum of enlisted men is thus limited to 25,000, the President is authorized in the measure before you, when exigencies of the service require it, to fill up and man companies and battalions by transfers thereto, or to increase by transfers from one company to another, so as to make the strength of a cavalry troop 100 men and in the artillery and infantry 125.

DECREASE OF OFFICERS.

While, then, there is no decrease proposed for the effective strength of the Army, there is, it is submitted, a reasonable, fair, and necessary reduction in the officers of the Army. That you may discover this, let us look for a moment at the Army as it now is. Why, sir, you have now in service eleven different corps of the general staff.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL.

You have the Adjutant-General's department with one brigadier-general, two colonels, four lieutenant-colonels, ten majors; in all seventeen, as a permanent establishment, with several hundred enlisted men.

INSPECTOR-GENERAL.

An Inspector-General's department with one brigadier-general, three colonels, two lieutenant-colonels, one major; in all, seven, as a permanent establishment.

BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

A bureau of military justice with one brigadier-general, eight majors, most of whom are brevetted to a higher rank, and possibly assigned to duty according to their brevets; nine officers in all.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

A quartermaster's department with one brigadier-general, four colonels, eight lieutenant-colonels, fourteen majors, thirty captains, seven military storekeepers, (captains,) being sixty-five officers in all.

SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT.

A subsistence department with one brigadier-general, two colonels, three lieutenant-colonels, eight majors, twelve captains; twenty-six officers in all, with one hundred and twenty-six commissary-sergeants.

PAY DEPARTMENT.

A pay department with one brigadier-general, two colonels, two lieutenant-colonels, fifty majors; fifty-five officers in all.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

A medical department with one brigadier-general, six colonels, ten lieutenant-colonels, fifty majors, one hundred and twenty-five captains; one hundred and seventy-nine officers in all, with two hundred hospital stewards. There are still existing four medical storekeepers.

ENGINEERS.

A corps of engineers with one brigadier-general, six colonels, twelve lieutenant-colonels, twenty-four majors, thirty captains, twenty-six first lieutenants, ten second lieutenants; one hundred and seven officers in all, with two hundred enlisted men.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

An ordnance department with one brigadier-general, three colonels, four lieutenent-colonels, ten majors, twenty captains, sixteen first lieutenants, ten storekeepers, (captains.) Recent legislation, however, has provided for the discontinuance of ordnance storekeepers.

CHAPLAINS.

Thirty-four post and regimental chaplains, with the rank of captain.

SIGNAL SERVICE.

The signal service with one colonel and an enlisted force of four hundred and fifty-men.

STAFF OFFICERS.

In these different corps, by a careful addition you will observe, sir, there are five hundred and eighty-four commissioned officers, nine of whom have the actual rank of brigadier-general and others are brevetted to the same. There are but few lieutenants in this conspicuous array of staff officers. Why, sir, we have in the line to-day five artillery, ten cavalry, and twenty-five infantry regiments. With your eleven corps of the general staff, you have for every three regiments and a fraction a separate staff department with officers of so high grade and so numerous that it has been well said the "operations and interests of one corps are so independent from the other that the whole Army is top-heavy and to a great extent unwieldy." Turn from this picture of the staff and look at the line.

LINE.

Cavalry.—You have ten cavalry regiments, with ten colonels, ten lieutenant-colonels, thirty majors, one hundred and twenty captains, one hundred and forty first lieutenants, and one hundred and ten second lieutenants; in all 420 officers, with 7,443 enlisted force.

Artillery.—You have five artillery regiments, with five colonels, five lieutenant-colonels, fifteen majors, sixty captains, one hundred and thirty first lieutenants, and sixty-eight second lieutenants; in all 283 officers, with an enlisted force of 2,497 men.

Infantry.—You have twenty-five infantry regiments, with twenty-five colonels, twenty-five lieutenant-colonels, twenty-five majors, two hundred and fifty captains, three hundred first lieutenants, and two hundred and fifty second lieutenants; making in all 875 officers, with an enlisted force of 10,028 men.

ACTIVE LIST.

On the active list of the Army there are: one general, one lieutenant-general, three major-generals, fifteen brigadier-generals, sixty-seven colonels, eighty-six lieutenant-colonels, two hundred and forty-two majors, five hundred and eighty-nine captains, five hundred and ninety-two first lieutenants, four hundred and fifty-one second lieutenants, forty adjutants, forty regimental quartermasters; making a total of 2,127.

Thirty-four post-chaplains are not included in the above.

Now, you will observe, sir, this is a large number of officers for a peace establishment of the Army. There are, as regimental officers, forty colonels, forty lieutenant-colonels, seventy majors, four hundred and thirty captains, making a total of five hundred and eighty in all. Nine of the brigadiers, twenty-seven of the colonels, forty-six of the lieutenant-colonels, one hundred and seventy-two of the majors, one hundred and fifty-seven of the captains, belong to the general staff.

EXCESSIVE STAFF.

A general distribution of these staff officers in the line would allow to each regiment within a fraction of two colonels, more than two lieutenant-colonels, six majors, and fifteen captains. Now, sir, while I take pride in the Army of the United States, I think it is just to kindly criticise such a ponderous staff arrangement and seek to bring it more in proportion to the peace establishment of our Army and more in consonance with the views of the intelligent American people. Under the act of July 28, 1866, the Army was twenty thousand stronger than at present. Under the act of 15th July, 1870, twenty regiments have been disbanded, but no corresponding reduction has been made in your staff departments. They remain practically equal in numbers to the requirements of an army of one hundred thousand men, with no cordial sympathy between them and the active arm of the service in the field. Gentlemen may talk about injustice to the staff and its efficiency for active duty. Sir, I would not pluck a laurel from the wreath that crowns the staff departments and the staff officials of the American Army. As a member of the National Congress I make no war on them. I know our staff departments were efficient in our recent internecine strife, but now, in these days, while surrounded by the smiling arts of peace, it is becoming for us to try to restore a measure of harmony and contentment, as near as may be, between the line and the staff, and at the same time economize somewhat in the public expenditure. Why, sir, it is a fact that nearly 90 per cent. of the amount of almost a million of dollars annually appropriated for commutation in the Army is absorbed by the general staff, whose officers are usually assigned to duty in the populous centers of the country. Why, sir, let us compare our staff organization with that of the armies of Europe. We can gain entertaining instruction by the comparison:

EUROPEAN STAFF.

In France, with a regular army of 470,000 men, their staff department contains but 400 officers. In England, with a standing army of 228,624 officers and men, all duties in the staff department are performed by officers detailed from the line. In Prussia the staff corps is little more than 300 officers for an army of 800,000 men.

STAFF OF 1860.

Instructive contrast can be made between the present composition of our staff departments and their condition prior to the time the war of the rebellion increased the Army. The Adjutant-General's department, in 1860, had 13 officers, 4 less than we have now; the Inspector-General's department 2 officers, 4 less than we have now; the Bureau of Military Justice 1 officer, now 9; in the Quartermaster's Department there were 44 officers, now 65.

In the Subsistence department there were 11 officers; there are now 26. In the Medical department there were 107 officers; there are now 179, exclusive of contract surgeons. In the Pay department there were 28 paymasters; there are now 55. In the Engineer Corps they had 88 officers; we have now 107 officers. In the Ordnance department there were 55; there are now 64. By a singular coincidence, while formerly captains and lieutenants largely predominated in numbers in these departments, they now scarcely equal the field officers there.

Did the interest of the public service require the existence of our staff departments in their present permanent expensive organization, Congress and the country should not and would not complain. The contentment of the Army and the continued efficiency of the staff departments require some modification of their present organization.

STAFF CHANGES.

This remedy is one of the prominent features of the pending measure. While but two departments are consolidated, the permanent officers in these departments have been largely reduced. The field officers have been reduced 60. The lowest permanent grade in the staff department by this bill is that of major. Such captains and lieutenants as may be required are to be supplied by detail from the line of the Army.

INTERCHANGEABLE STAFF.

This, sir, is by the adoption of the policy of interchangeability from the line to the staff and from the staff to the line. This change is most material, and has for its wisdom the highest sanction. In Germany, Italy, Austria, and Russia officers are continually transferred from the line to the staff; then back to the line, except in Germany. There, when once sent back to the line, the officer may never be recalled.

GENERAL SHERMAN.

In approval of this policy a long line of distinguished officers of our Army have spoken. General Sherman, in answer to some inquiries submitted to him by the Military Committee of this House about three years ago, gave the interchangeability plan emphatic approval.

I quote question and answer:

Question. In your judgment, do the duties of the Ordnance and Engineer Corps, being scientific specialties, require their separation from the ordinary routine of Army duties? Do they require seclusion, as it were, from the Army?

Answer. I think not. I think, on the contrary, that all officers of the Army, in their own interest, should know what a soldier can do, in order to know what works of defense and offense are proper. I asked of Field-Marshal von Moltke, in Prussia, who, I suppose, at this moment stands at the very head of the military profession—I said to him: "You are chief of the staff, which embraces all the staff departments of the Prussian army. You bring young officers to Berlin to school, as we send our young men to West Point. Do you ever send them to their regiments?" His reply was, "Oh, yes; they go to their regiments. We never separate an officer from troops except by way of detail. He goes back to his troops again as soon as the special service is ended. No officer is ever permanently out of the line of the army." My understanding from the conversation I had with Von Moltke and others, however, was that officers of the staff departments in the Prussian army are detached as chiefs of staff and assigned to generals of corps, generals of divisions and brigades, but that these officers are at no time for a very long period separated from the troops of the line. In other words, every staff officer is required, for a considerable period of his life, to serve with soldiers. In our Army, as I have said, an ordnance or engineer officer knows no more about commanding soldiers and of the conduct of the men who carry the muskets than other well-educated gentlemen.

OPINIONS OF ARMY OFFICERS.

In addition to this opinion of the General of the Army I will cite the names of such experienced Army officers as Generals Crook, Barry, Roberts, Wood, Kingsbury, Sully, Brannan, Heintzelman, Franklin, Hooker, Hatch, Casey, Upton, Doubleday, Stanley, Gibbon, Grierson, Buell, Hazen, McClellan, Reynolds, Hunt, and others, and shall refer to their opinions, which can be read in the RECORD at the close of my remarks. To these I could add the opinions of several Presidents and Secretaries of War were it necessary. But, sir, not only is this policy wise for efficiency and economy, for I believe it will reduce the expense of our military establishment more than half a million of dollars and very soon more than a million, but it is a measure of harmony in the Army, ultimately establishing more cordial and kindly relations between the staff and the line. No careful observer can be ignorant of the jealousies and conflicts existing and growing between the line and staff officers. The idea obtains that staff appointments give "soft snaps," in Army parlance, to the recipients, and are secured by personal favoritism and political influence. The line officer in the unattractive peace, service, of the frontier longs for a staff position, that he may get nearer civilization for himself and family, and possibly under the shadow of political friends, influential at court, rapidly secure that increased rank staff officers enjoy. To the truth of this utterance I can produce evidence piling "Pelion upon Ossa." It is submitted, then, in all confidence, the changes proposed in our staff departments are wise and should prevail.

BATTALION FORMATIONS.

Turning from the staff features of the bill, I would press upon the attention of the House the organic propositions for the line of the Army. I have said the enlisted force is not increased or decreased; yet the system of battalion formations in the different regiments, giving to each corps of the line three battalions, all officered and but two manned until the further direction of Congress, gives more effectiveness for the men already there and facilities for increase and mobilization of the forces when exigencies occur. Already in the cavalry, under existing law, we have the three-battalion regimental organization. Experience has demonstrated its wisdom. At present you have in your cavalry an enlisted force of 7,443 men. This is to be concentrated in two battalions in the respective regiments, and distributed into sixty-four companies. When the emergency arises the third battalion is already officered and ready to be manned, thus immediately adding thirty-two companies of seventy-nine men each, giving 2,528; so in the artillery, the third battalion of four companies for each regiment, making twenty companies of sixty men each, giving 1,200 men; so with your infantry, the third battalion with four companies of eighty-eight men each for eighteen regiments, making seventy-two companies, giving 6,336 men—thus, without any increase of officers or delays for organization, giving an instant increase of effective force in the line of the Army of 10,064 men. Adding these to your 25,000 men, you have an army of about 35,000 men. Then, sir, you have on paper your fourth battalion. Organize and man it without confusion or delay; you add about 10,000 more to your enlisted force, giving you an army of nearly 50,000 men instantly organized, "armed, and equipped for the fray;" and this by authority given in an act of Congress, when it is desired, of less than ten lines in length.

Sir, I shall not pause to further comment in tedious length on other features of the bill. But, sir, I hear it said you propose a reduction of some three hundred officers and that it is harsh to turn into the world so many men trained only to be professional soldiers. I shall not long tarry to parley with this criticism. The Government is, wants to be, and ought to be, kind to its soldiery. But, sir, in these times of shrinkage in values, business embarrassments, and decreasing revenues, the paramount inquiry is, Can the Government afford to continue in service officers the public necessities do not require? It is statesmanship to look this question in the face and pass upon it as intelligent business men, heedless of the personal appeals that reach us here in Washington and elsewhere from individuals and families personally interested.

GOVERNMENTS CANNOT RETAIN SUPERNUMERARY OFFICERS.

What government out of mere sympathy retains a large army list? England musters out officers and soldiers not needed. So does France. So does Germany. So have the United States always done after its great wars. In 1815 the number of major-generals, which had been six in number, was instantly reduced to two, and the brigadiers to four from six, and they, with many of lower rank, only allowed three months' pay proper. So after the Mexican war. The President, by act of June 18, 1846, was directed to select one major-general and two brigadiers out of those then in commission and all the rest to be mustered out. So it has always been and must necessarily be, agreeably to the genius of our institutions, which abhors unnecessarily large and expensive military establishments.

In reading a speech the other day of the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] I was struck with the disproportion of the officers of staff and line in the Navy to the men enlisted there. From his statistics I discover the Navy by law is limited to 7,500 men. We have there 2,020 officers, exclusive of the retired officers there, or one officer to three men and a fraction. Some prudent reform could be made of this enervating extravagance. What has been said of the Navy can be said with great emphasis of the Army. Tell me not, sir, the provision for the retirement of such officers as may become supernumerary if this bill is enacted into a law are harsh to the American soldier.

RETIRED LIST.

Pause and read the bill where it provides generous care for the supernumerary officer. I cannot tarry to dwell in detail, but observe the fortieth section; a reserve list has been established for the benefit of officers who shall be transferred from the line and the staff and not otherwise disposed of. The present legal limit of three hundred for the retired list is suspended, and every officer who has been thirty years in the service may upon his own application be placed upon the retired list; that general officers shall not be retired until after the age of sixty-five years, and not then if the President otherwise directs, and officers of other rank not until they have reached the age of sixty-two. This reserved list which has been created to make provision for officers made unnecessary by this bill is continued for three years, and any officer upon this reserved list may resign within six months from his being placed on it and receive three years' full pay for his rank. Tell me not these are harsh provisions to the officer. The Government throws its great arm gently around those whose services are no longer required and lifts them into the walks again of private life with generous aid to start in their new career. As evidence of the value of this assistance, imagine a colonel after being ten years in the service transferred to this reserved list. His annual pay would be about $4,200. Should he desire to resign he would receive three years' pay immediately, giving him more than $12,000 to start in the new battle of life. The United States Government has been more generous, and wants to be, to its soldiers than any other enlightened government. I submit the studied care for the supernumerary officer this measure gives is in keeping with the history of our legislation in this behalf. But, sir, I cannot tarry to further discuss these features.

As I look around me, I observe here as our peers generals, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, captains, lieutenants, sergeants, privates,—ay, there are men here who served in the ranks of the Army as privates in the day of trial. The men who composed the Army of the Union have been distributed and mixed up in our business society. Their interests are—what? To have a large standing army, to have an expensive military establishment? No, sir. Let it not be said then, Mr. Chairman, that those who advocate this bill are unfriendly to the Army. The Army of the United States is popular. The country owes it a great debt of gratitude, a debt which it recognizes. But, sir, who compose the Army of the United States to-day? A very respectable class of gentlemen in the rank and file, most conspicuous and gallant men command our Army; many of them won honorable distinction in the war against rebellion.

But, sir, the great mass of the Army of the Union—the rank and the file—the gallant men who bore the cause of the Union to triumph and victory, are not in the Army to-day. They have retired according to our American system to the vocations of private life. Some of them are in this Hall, making laws for the nation. They are business men; they are patriotic men. All they desire is to have such an Army as the public necessities require, so that the burdens of the people may be lightened. Some of the men whose gallantry gave popularity to the Army in the recent past suffer because of the burdens upon their business to raise a revenue to pay for an expensive military establishment. Let it not be said, then, Mr. Chairman, that those who are in favor of this reasonable, this just, this practicable modification of the present organization of the Army are hostile to those men to whom the country will always be grateful.

I shall vote most cheerfully for the provisions of this measure.

APPENDIX.

OPINION OF ARMY OFFICERS QUOTED IN THE FOREGOING.

A brief notice of the opinions of some officers favoring details for the staff and opposed to entire permanency may not be unprofitable.

General Barry thinks that permanency in the Adjutant-General's and Inspector-General's department is injurious.

General Roberts says the tendency of permanence is to destroy the Army esprit de corps that should run through all branches; that officers cannot be eminently and generally useful when they are unfamiliar in the duties and practical functions of the great arms of service that play the principal parts in actual war; that experience has demonstrated that the more valuable officers were developed from the general service.

General Wood says the effect of permanency is to render staff officers to some extent arrogant and offensive to the great body of the Army, and to narrow and cramp their intellects for general usefulness at first, and after a long service for their own special duties; that staff officers should not be kept at one station more than a fixed term, not long, thus securing the greatest variety and breadth of experience. Up to the grade of field officer no one should be allowed promotion without standing the test of a thorough and searching competitive examination, embracing professional acquirements, moral character, and physical ability; that such competition would beget habits of industry, studiousness, attention, and devotion to duty, of morality, temperance, and sobriety among the younger officers. This would cut off the evil of promotion by seniority and by favoritism alike.

General Kingsbury says the tendency of the policy of permanency is to narrow the views of the officer, alienate his sympathies from other branches of the service, and encourage a species of corps exclusiveness. The effect of transfers from one duty to another is to enlarge the mind, liberalize the ideas of the officer, qualify him for a wider range of duties, and better fit him for the sudden exigencies of the service.

General Sully thinks that before an officer is appointed in the staff he should serve five years in the line, and that a certain number of company officers should be selected from the line and put on duty temporarily with that branch of the staff for which they may be thought to have a particular aptness, and after sufficient probation be put on the permanent staff.

General Brannan thinks the power of transferring to the line or dropping entirely from the service should be retained in case of inefficiency or worthlessness of staff officers.

General Heintzelman thinks the effect of permanency is to make staff officers more efficient in some respects, but on the other hand from not serving with troops they lose sight of the wants and requirements of the field. No officer should be permanently attached to the staff until he has served some time with troops in the field or on the frontier. A greater freedom of detail and transfer than at present would be beneficial.

General Ord thinks that the President should be allowed to transfer officers of the same rank from the staff to the line, or the reverse, at his option. This would be a check on disbursing officers, would result in the selection of men better fitted for the places, besides giving them instruction.

General Franklin thinks that as to officers of the Quartermaster's, Commissary, and Pay departments, their duties being connected with the supplies of the troops, that those officers ought to serve with the troops at intervals; that unless the officers of the Adjutant-General's department are placed in direct communication with the troops, there grows up in them a distaste to any but the merest routine office duty. Promotions ought to be within the corps if the idea of service with the troops can be carried out. If it cannot be, then divide the promotions, above the lowest grade of the corps, between the staff and regimental officers. It would improve the status of the Army if there could be assigned, from the graduates of the Military Academy, every year, a small number of officers who would be at once rated as staff officers. They should serve two years in each arm of the line (infantry, artillery, cavalry) as company officers; should then undergo a rigid examination, and, if found qualified, should then be eligible for appointment in the lowest grades of the staff, which in some corps should be lower than at present.

General Crawford thinks that the effect of permanency in the staff is to create a corps of experts, and, where the education is necessarily scientific, it would appear to be proper that the officers should be permanent and that promotion should take place only in these corps. That is true of the Engineer's, Judge-Advocate's, and Medical departments, but in the others, except in the highest grades, to be filled by selection, the officers should be returnable, after a term of service, to the line, thus providing for a larger class of officers instructed in staff duties to draw from in emergencies.

General Hooker says, by the system of education at the Military Academy, officers are educated in all the arms of the service alike. This rule should be extended to the staff corps and preserved in the line of the Army after they become officers. All other things being equal, that army which is the best instructed in all the branches of the service will be the most efficient, and expands more readily.

General Hatch says the effect of continuing the same officer in a particular department of the staff and allowing only promotions in the same is bad. Such officers become so assured of their positions and advancement that they lose all emulation to excel, knowing that no degree of excellence can advance them. They should be selected from the Army at large.

General Casey says, let every officer of the Army be required to pass an examination for promotion until he reaches the grade of major.

General Augur says an officer should not be put on the general staff until he is thoroughly familiar with the duties and responsibilities of a line officer.

General Upton says in special corps, like the Engineer or Medical Corps, officers are unquestionably more efficient who are educated, trained, and promoted specially for these services. But in order to increase the amount of staff knowledge in the Army, and to keep the officers of the staff corps acquainted with the wants and requirements of the line, transfers from the staff to the line, and the reverse, for a period not exceeding four years, would in the highest degree be beneficial. The duties of the adjutants and inspectors general, quartermasters, commissaries, and paymasters are in no degree scientific, and can be learned by officers detailed from the line. Promotions to the grade of first lieutenant in the Ordnance and Engineer Corps should be made, not from the Military Academy, but by competitive examination from first and second lieutenants who have served three years in the line. Cadets who graduate with high honors may become indolent, but three years' continuous preparation for examination for promotion would be highly advantageous.

General Doubleday says the present system of continuing the same officers in a special branch of the service is not beneficial, except for the Engineer, Ordnance, and Medical departments. Everything in the Army should be subordinate to the fighting element. To transfer from the line to the staff and from the staff to the line has a tendency to bind all parts of the service together, and to excite the young officers to study and to emulate each other.

General Stanley says the effect of continuing the same officers in a particular department or corps of the staff, and of allowing only promotions therein, is to produce a set of narrow-minded and inefficient men, who, enjoying great ease and comfort during peace, are totally unfitted for war. A law making transfers between line and staff, and from one staff corps to another, up to the rank of major, would stimulate ambition and promote study and efficiency. The Prussian practice is the correct one: i. e., to place staff officers on the most varied duties, and especially to serve a proper time in the line. Transfers should be made between the engineers and the line when engineer officers prove unapt and the line officer gave evidence of the necessary qualifications, as proved by examinations.

General Gibbon thinks that officers should be transferred from the staff to the different arms of the line, so as to serve for a term of years in each. The staff of an army should consist of the very first brains of the service, thoroughly conversant with all its details; and such a knowledge can only be attained by service in the different arms. When a vacancy occurs it should be filled not by promotion, but by selection from all of those of the next lower grade in both line and staff, the General-in-Chief making the selection from a certain number, say three, nominated by an advisory board. This would promote efficiency, put the best ability in the staff, and restore sympathy between the staff and line. Staff positions are a prize, and thus can be obtained by the deserving. This system should be adopted only with reference to those branches of the staff corps which, from the nature of their duties, are most intimately connected with the line, namely, the Adjutant's, Quartermaster's, Subsistence, Judge-Advocate's and Inspector's departments. This method of selection should be for grades below that of colonel. All persons educated, trained, and promoted for a specialty are more efficient for that specialty, but officers of the Army are not more efficient as military officers from being so educated; their efficiency should be increased by a greater freedom of detail and transfer.

General Grierson thinks that a greater freedom of detail in the staff corps would be beneficial, for the reason that an officer educated for one branch does not know enough of other duties. An opportunity should be given officers to be transferred, and every officer should be compelled to serve a portion of his time with troops in the field.

General Crook thinks that officers being so much stationed in cities and not with troops become fossilized, and lose sight of the wants of the troops in the field. If staff officers were to go more among the troops he thinks it would be better to have them educated, trained, and promoted for specialties of the service; but under the present management a greater freedom of detail and transfer is better.

General George P. Buell thinks the continuance of staff officers in the same department or corps begets narrow-mindedness, a partiality for their own corps, until an officer may not be capable in anything else. There is no branch of the staff, except the Engineer, Medical, and Ordnance departments, that any officer of ordinary education, good sense, energy, industry, ambition, pride, and courage cannot accomplish in a few years.

General McClellan thinks that the functions of the lower grades in the various staff corps should be performed by officers detailed from the line for a period long enough to instruct them fully, and that the higher grades should be permanently filled by selections from among the best of the line officers who have been thus detailed. These details should not continue longer than four years. In this manner the knowledge of staff duties would be widely spread through the line, to the benefit of the whole service. To provide for this without injury there should be a sufficient number of supernumerary officers.

This reduction of officers would increase the efficiency and decrease the expenses of the Army.

It is fair to assume that the pay of three hundred and thirty-seven officers would amount to about $700,000 annually.

Mr. DIBRELL. Mr. Chairman, the subject of reorganizing the Army and the necessity therefor has been thoroughly discussed for the last four years. All agree that certain branches of the Army is in bad shape and legislation is necessary to reform it, while many agree that some general law should be enacted to settle the question and get the Army out of the political discussions of the day. To that end Congress at its last session enacted that a joint committee of three Senators and five Representatives should be appointed with full power to prepare and report a bill for that purpose. In pursuance of that law said joint committee was appointed, and after great pains and labor and nearly six months' time this committee have reported to both Houses of Congress the bill under consideration, a substitute for House bill 5499, as the result of their joint labor.

The friends of this bill do not claim that the bill is perfect, nor do they claim that they were a unit in favor of all its provisions, but it was the best and most perfect system or bill they could agree upon, and I am free to confess it is a great improvement on the present organization. The bill reduces the staff of all of the general officers and reduces the expenses of the Army to that extent. It provides that the offices of General and Lieutenant-General shall expire when vacated by the present incumbents, and reduces the major-generals to two and the brigadiers to four as may happen by casualties.

It embraces many new and important provisions for the proper administration of the Army, and some provisions that are now the law. While I have always believed that a large standing army in time of peace was dangerous to the liberties of the people, yet I yielded my opinions in this case as to the number of enlisted men our Army should contain, believing that the rights of the citizens were, in the main, well guarded. The number of enlisted men as stated in the bill, at twenty-five thousand, is a question upon which good men differ, but if Congress should think the number should be greater or less, that should not vitiate and destroy the whole bill. Your committee, as stated before, were not a unit upon many important questions, although they all signed the report who were present and participated in the formation of the bill. The large frontier country to guard, the trouble with the Indians, with threatened trouble upon the Mexican border, make a respectable-sized army necessary, and twenty-five thousand enlisted men, under this organization, will be an army sufficient for all contingencies that are likely to arise in the next few years.

I am pleased to state that in all of our deliberations there was nothing that smacked of politics or selfishness, but each individual member of the committee appeared to look alone to the good of the service and to the efficiency and economy in the administration of the Army.

The consolidation of the twenty-five infantry regiments by reducing the number to eighteen is certainly a great improvement over the present skeleton regiments as now composed, and disposes of one hundred and thirty-six commissioned officers in the line of the entire Army. Under the present organization, our Army in some instances looks as if it was an army of officers without enlisted men. The proof taken by the Committee on Military Affairs at the last session of this Congress will astonish those not familiar with the present organization. (See Miscellaneous Document No. 56.) The cavalry regiments are reduced to eight instead of ten, but because of the addition of another battalion there is no reduction of officers in this branch of the service, which is deemed important in view of the large frontier country that the cavalry has to protect and patrol.

The artillery regiments remain at five as at present, with a reduction of fifteen officers. It was deemed expedient not to reduce the number of artillery regiments because of their necessity in guarding and protecting our coast defenses, and as a nucleus for a larger increase in case of a war with any foreign power.

In the various staff departments the number of officers dispensed with is 201, besides 180 contract surgeons who are not to be employed except in cases of emergency as provided in the bill, making a grand total of 337 commissioned officers and the 180 contract surgeons, being a net saving of at least 450 salaried officers costing the tax-payers of the country more than a million of dollars annually.

The bill consolidates the Adjutant and Inspector General's departments into the general staff, with a saving of six officers.

It does not affect the present Signal Service organization, nor does it change or affect the organization of the Engineer's department. These departments it is believed are necessary with their present force to meet the wants of the country.

Your committee had the opinion of many of the most distinguished officers of the Army upon the subject of reorganization, many of whom submitted plans, by bill and otherwise, and from all of these, with their own experience and judgment, they have agreed upon this bill, and presented it to Congress as the result of their joint labors. They believed that eight full regiments of cavalry, well officered and manned, would be more efficient than the ten regiments under the present law. And by the addition of the fourth battalion the strength of each regiment could in an emergency be greatly increased without the expense of additional field officers; and as cavalry is much more expensive than either of the other branches of the Army it may in the near future be practicable to even reduce the number of cavalry regiments, or at least to unman the third battalions of the cavalry regiments as provided in the bill. The bill also provides that the third battalions of infantry and artillery shall not be manned until ordered hereafter. It provides for the use of the artillery and cavalry as infantry, and for the use of the infantry as cavalry, as under existing laws. It provides that no contract surgeon shall be employed except in cases of emergency, approved by the general commanding the Army. This gets rid of an abuse that has long been practiced, costing the country from one hundred and eighty to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars annually.

We have now in the Army of commissioned surgeons and assistant surgeons one hundred and ninety-two officers. We have less than one hundred and forty military stations where troops are quartered, and where a medical officer is required; and in the face of this showing there has been employed from one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five surgeons upon contract, at an average of $1,500 each per year; from four to six in this city, with a like number in other cities where their services were not needed. Why should we pay four contract surgeons $6,000 per year for services in this city where we have probably a dozen commissioned surgeons with only about two hundred soldiers on duty or stationed at this point? Let us get rid of this useless expenditure, even if it does shut out the sons of the head of the department, who have been employed as I believe unnecessarily at a great cost to the country.

I would under no circumstances deprive the soldiers of the necessary medical attendance they require, nor of medicines and supplies, but I would compel the surgeons of the Army to discharge their duties first, and if additional medical aid is wanted let the order to contract for it be approved by the general commanding the Army, and let none be employed unless actually needed. My opinion from testimony taken by the Committee on Military Affairs is that a great waste of money has been had in the Medical department of the Army, and this proviso will stop at least the above estimates.

The bill makes a large reduction in the Department of Military Justice, which is right and proper; the reviewing of courts-martial and other duties required of this department can be easily performed by the force allowed by this bill.

The reserved list for supernumerary officers was agreed upon as the best plan to dispose of the large number of surplus officers. Giving those who may wish a chance to resign upon favorable terms, and those unfit for duty either to be mustered out with a liberal gratuity or retired, and this reserved list shall be maintained for three years or until Congress shall otherwise direct. The retired list of officers is getting to be a heavy burden to the tax-payers of the country, and the number of officers now out of the Army as well as those in, trying to get on that list, strengthens that opinion. All of the officers upon the reserved list until finally disposed of can be used in some manner, either as instructors in colleges and schools, or they may take the place of civilians now employed by the Quartermaster-General in investigating claims at a cost of $125 per month and expenses paid, or employed in the Pension Office in working off the large number of cases that have accumulated there. But it is to be hoped that they will all accept the gratuity and resign, and relieve the tax-payers to that extent. There are various other new and important features in this bill which neither time nor space will allow to be discussed now, but taking the bill as a whole it is a great improvement on the present organization. And as I opposed several things in the bill, but yielded to the opinions of the majority of the committee, I now feel bound to yield to the bill as reported to the House my unqualified support.

That there is an organized opposition to the bill none will deny. This organization is strong, and will bring to bear a powerful influence upon Congress to defeat the bill; and why? Is it because they propose a better bill? Is it because it is against the interest of the tax-payers of the country who pay the money to support the Army? I answer, emphatically, no. It is not because they propose a better plan, not because they want to lessen the expenses of the Army below that proposed in this bill. No, sir; all of this organized opposition comes from interested parties with selfish motives. It provides for the appointing of retiring boards, so that every officer placed upon the reserved or retired list may have a fair hearing, and that he shall not be dismissed or retired without a hearing, thus avoiding much complaint that annually comes to Congress of the action of what is commonly called the benzine board. We want live, energetic men in the Army, men who can stand the hardships and privations of a frontier service, and are willing to perform it. And a retiring board would naturally select the best men for the service, placing all those incapacitated upon this reserved list, either to be retired or mustered out of the service with the gratuity as provided in the bill. It also provides for promotions by seniority, which is right and proper, and prevents the appointment of civilians to life-time positions in the Army over the heads of meritorious soldiers—a practice that has been frequently adopted, but it is against good military discipline, and should not be allowed. The provision requiring an officer to serve six years in the line before he can be transferred to the staff department is a wise and judicious one, and should be adhered to.

In my advocacy of this bill I have no friends to reward or enemies to punish, but simply a duty to perform to my country and to my constituents. No personal motives have influenced me in any instance upon any vote upon any part of this bill. I have labored to try to make the Army more efficient and less expensive, and to that end have worked and for that alone. And when I see the opposition arrayed to this bill by interested parties I again warn Congress against them; and those who have taken but little interest in the matter I respectfully ask to read the testimony of the various staff and Army officers taken by the Committee on Military Affairs at the last session of the present Congress, contained in Miscellaneous Document No. 56, second session Forty-fifth Congress. There they will see from the testimony of Army officers that many companies are almost destitute of enlisted men, that some regiments are mere skeletons, and that every intelligent officer favored reorganization in some way, so as to make the Army more compact and efficient.

There you will see from the sworn testimony many abuses heaped upon the tax-payers of the country by the staff officers in the renting of quarters, receiving forage for private horses used for private purposes, appointing of sons and brothers to fat offices on good pay with easy work; in fact, a general waste of public money. And this staff department are using every means in their power to defeat this bill. They have enlisted in the crusade against the bill all the friends in this city and elsewhere of the staff and Army officers on duty in staff departments, who are opposing the interchangeable system of the bill, by which a gallant staff officer who has bravely stood the toils and troubles of a city life for a certain period shall be required to enjoy the luxury of a frontier life among the Indians and Mexicans. This would be very hard, especially on the officer who has spent twenty years' service upon the frontier in fighting Indians, to be suddenly transferred to an easy staff department at the capital. But your committee, believing it was proper that line officers should perform and understand staff duty, and that staff officers should in the same manner perform and understand the duties of a line officer, ingrafted this wise provision in the bill, which I trust will not be stricken out. This will familiarize all line officers with staff duty, will diminish red-tapeism in the Army, will give us a more efficient staff department, and add greatly to the efficiency of the service.

In that same report will be seen reasons sufficient to justify the large reduction made in the Pay department. The testimony taken shows that the paymasters the preceding year were engaged upon an average just eleven days each for two months in paying the troops during the entire year, when each paymaster, with his clerk, quarters, forage, traveling expenses, &c., costs the tax-payers, say, about $7,000 annually; and still with this showing the Paymaster-General opposed any immediate reduction of paymasters. This may be taken as about a fair sample of the amount of service performed by most of the staff departments, nearly or quite all of whom oppose any reduction of the force in their departments, and thus antagonize this whole bill.

This bill makes large reductions in the staff departments generally, because the staff is the expensive part of the Army, and in fact it is getting to believe that it is the Army, and it is absolutely necessary to check this sentiment and teach them that the people are supreme and have rights that must be obeyed. The extravagant waste of money by this large and unnecessary class of officers is a great nuisance that ought to be abated.

This bill increases the number of officers that may be detailed to colleges as instructors to seventy-six instead of thirty as now provided by law, to be distributed among the States according to population when said officers are not required for active duty in the field. This is a wise provision. By a proper distribution of these officers to the different States, instructing the youth of the country in the arts and sciences of war, many young men would thus receive a military education that might in case of war be valuable to the country, for experience has proven that no country in the world has a better citizen soldiery than has the United States, nor has any one a citizen soldiery that will more promptly respond to their country's call than ours; hence the advantages to be derived from disseminating as much military knowledge in our schools and colleges as possible.

I append herewith Executive Document No. 23, third session Forty-fifth Congress, showing the strength of the Army at various periods down to the present time, as also the number of officers, enlisted men, &c., in each branch of the service, which is made a part of my remarks:

E. D. TOWNSEND, Adjutant General.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1879.

From this it will be seen that in June, 1861, we had an army of 16,422 men all told, 1,004 officers, 344 of whom were staff officers. In January, 1878, we had an army of 23,000 men, in all nearly 26,000 men, with 2,153 officers, 596 of whom are staff officers. In October, 1867, we had an army of 56,815 men, with 2,853 officers, 674 of whom were staff officers, or one staff officer to each eighty-four men in the Army as against one staff officer to each forty-three men in the Army now. While the Army has been reduced, since 1867, 31,000 men, the staff has been reduced only 78 officers. Hence I say that a much greater reduction in the various staff departments can be made than this bill proposes without the least danger of crippling the service. But they have arrayed themselves so strongly against this bill that they may even become masters of the situation and control the action of Congress in defeating it, and the honest tax-payers may still have to groan under this useless and unnecessary burden to support this useless and unnecessary number of officers, living in ease and luxury, performing little work, and receiving large salaries.

In our Army we have a commissioned officer for each ten men. In France and Germany they have a commissioned officer for each fifty men. And we should not be more extravagant in foisting an army of commissioned officers upon the tax-payers of the country than other enlightened countries do. My candid opinion is that if we had but one commissioned officer to each fifty men we would have a more efficient Army and one that would be less troublesome to the commanding officers and to the country. This bill reduces the number of officers to one for each fourteen men, or the whole number of officers to 1,818, as against 2,157 officers now commissioned, besides the 180 contract surgeons paid $1,500 each per year and various persons employed in the military service at about the same price. It also reduces the number of staff officers in all 201 and the line officers 136, including the general officers whose offices expire when vacated by them, and reduces the staff to 395 as against 596 now on duty.

This bill has the approval of a large number of the best officers in the line of our Army; they know the necessity of reorganization and suffer by abuses sought to be remedied by the bill. They desire the question of reorganization settled, that Congress and the Army may be at rest so far as the Army is concerned.

I believe that the passage of this bill is the very best thing that we can do for the Army, and, believing so, I earnestly invite my friends to aid us in passing the bill. Do not vote against the bill for fear some personal friend may have to leave the Army. If he is unfit for the service he should not be there. Besides, the gratuity paid for resigning or retiring is very liberal and is ample for any ordinary emergency.

Do not vote against it because of the interchangeable system which will cause the staff to interchange with the line and vice versa, one of the best provisions in the bill. The line should be familiar with staff duty and the staff should certainly be familiar with the duties of a line officer and service in the field.

As before stated, I have always believed large standing armies were dangerous to the liberties of the people. I also believe that for the first half century of our national existence such an idea as that of keeping a large standing Army was never entertained by the pure and enlightened statesmen that enacted laws for our government and protection; but of later years our people, to a greater or less extent, have been educated up to the belief that a standing Army is a national necessity, and just so long as that opinion predominates Congress will have to provide the Army and the means of supporting it. But when it becomes necessary to reduce the Army, it can be accomplished much easier by the proposed organization of thirty-one regiments than with its present organization of forty skeleton regiments

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed and that the House proceed to consider the bill under the five-minute rule.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by clauses for amendment, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1880, as follows:

For expenses of the commanding general's office, $2,560.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SAYLER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6145) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House take a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Several gentlemen desire to introduce bills, resolutions, &c., by unanimous consent; and if there be no objection, the Chair will recognize them.

Mr. EDEN. I have no objection to the Chair recognizing gentlemen for the purpose merely of introducing bills and other matters of that character; but I do object to recognizing any gentleman to put any bill on its passage.

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, requesting the Senators and Representatives in Congress from that State to urge the enactment of such laws as may be necessary to prevent the exercise of jurisdiction by the courts of the United States in proceedings against municipal corporations in the several States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

COLLECTION OF DIRECT TAXES.

Mr. BURDICK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire and report what legislation, if any, is necessary and expedient to enable the proper officers of the Treasury Department of the United States to collect the amount of the direct tax remaining unpaid and due from the various States and Territories apportioned to them under the act approved August 5, 1861.

Mr. BURDICK. I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue upon the subject of this resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

The document is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, January 30, 1879.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 29th instant, I herewith transmit to you a statement in regard to direct-tax matters that will give you an insight into the present condition of that tax. The amount remaining uncollected, you will observe, is something over $3,000,000. The machinery for its collection has disappeared for want of legislation and it is now a question with Congress whether the tax shall ever be collected.

Very respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

Hon. T. W. BURDICK,
House of Representatives.

DIRECT TAX.

By the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861, a United States direct tax of $20,000,000 per annum was apportioned, pro rata, to the then existing States, Territories, and District of Columbia.

This tax, according to the original act, was to have been an annual tax, but Congress by an act approved July 1, 1862, limited the collection to that one tax until April 1, 1865, and by an act approved June 30, 1864, limited it to one year until further legislation.

Most of the Northern States and Territories formally assumed payment of their respective quotas and gave notice of their intention to pay the same. Some of them have liquidated the amounts charged against them in full, some only in part, while others have neglected to pay any part of their quota.

The following amounts still remain due, according to the records of this Department, from the loyal States and Territories.

Oregon, Utah, and Colorado have paid no part of their quotas.

	Tax due.
Kansas	$62,382 51
California	7,093 26
Oregon	35,140 66
Wisconsin	218,032 69
Utah	26,962 00
Washington Territory	3,487 17
Colorado	22,905 33
Total	376,023 62

Amount of direct tax remaining uncollected in the late insurrectionary States.

States.	Quota.	Uncollected.
Virginia	$937,550⅔	$286,499 37
North Carolina	576,194⅔	198,742 60
South Carolina	363,570⅔	152,781 35
Georgia	584,367½	501,939 86
Florida	77,522⅔	71,027 38
Alabama	529,313⅓	529,313 33⅓
Mississippi	413,084⅔	343,500 12
Louisiana	385,886⅔	71,385 83
Texas	355,016⅔	174,285 16
Arkansas	261,886	107,686 72
Tennessee	669,498	289,693 43
Total	5,153,891 33⅓	2,726,834 61⅔

The taxes in the late insurrectionary States were collected by boards of direct tax commissioners under the act of June 7, 1862, as amended. While the tax commissioners appointed under the act of June 7, 1862, were actively engaged in making assessments and collecting this tax, and had already collected about one-half the total amount apportioned to these eleven States, Congress, by an act approved July 28, 1866, authorized the suspension of further collection in these States until January 1, 1868, and collections were forthwith suspended by order of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The time specified in the act expired but the collections were not resumed; meanwhile most of the commissioners had been relieved from duty.

Again Congress, by an act approved July 23, 1868, provided for the further suspension of the collection of this tax in these States until January 1, 1869, since which no action has been taken by Congress further suspending said collections, nor have collections been resumed in any of these States.

Total amount of direct tax levied by the act of August 5, 1861, and remaining uncollected, $3,102,858.23.

MEMORIAL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress now assembled:

Whereas a bill has been introduced and is now pending in the Senate of the United States extending the provisions of the act of Congress of September 28, 1850, and the 2d of March, 1855, relative to swamp and overflowed lands in Nebraska and other new States; and

Whereas it is but simple justice that the new States organized since the passage of said acts and amendments should enjoy the same rights under laws while assuming the same obligations of their older sisters: Therefore,

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Nebraska, would most respectfully urge upon your honorable body the passage of said bill, Senate file No. 780.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and is hereby, instructed to transmit two certified copies of this memorial and joint resolution to each one of our Senators and Members of Congress without delay, who are hereby requested to use all means to secure the passage of the same.

Resolved by the General Assembly of Virginia, 1. 2. And that in view of the fact that business has been sorely depressed by the long delay of Congress to reach final action on the question, we invoke them to insist on a speedy disposition of it, and to employ every legitimate means to consummate the partial relief desired.
